"Swy, su Ecks," said Mrs. O'Brien, holding up two fingers to emphasize her words, and majestically surveying the train.

"Swoity clossy," added Mr. O'Brien, who piqued himself on knowing some German.

"Here we are, mother," cried the girls, who had meanwhile found out the carriage; whereupon the whole party got in, excepting Harry, who remained outside to hand in the bags.

"One, two, three, four," said Mrs. O'Brien, as she took them from him, and hoisted them up on the shelf provided for this purpose.

"Well!"

"Hm!"

The exclamation came from a lady and gentleman seated opposite. Whether it was the size of the bags, or the muscular strength of the lady who lifted them, that elicited the interjections, the writer knows not.

"Five, six, seven eight, nine, ten," continued Mrs. O'Brien calmly, as she took up four more. "That's all," she added when she had distributed them among her family. "How glad I am we're comfortably settled, dears."

They looked a comfortable party. Mr. O'Brien, a chronic sufferer from gout, was practicing what Diderot calls the "grimace pathetique" under a bag laid across his knees. Charlotte, never remarkable for steadiness, and now really enervated, was indulging in the delight of sweet sixteen and giggling, for which her elder sister, Margaret, was frowning severely at her, whilst little Geraldine was sobbing her heart out behind and under an enormous bag which was crushing her small, fat person.

Nobody spoke.

It was the first and last time Mr. O'Brien insisted on his wife traveling without luggage. She had carried the day.

This is what the second Miss O'Brien, with the astuteness of sixteen, fully recognized, and most anxious was she to impart the fact to her younger sister.

"I say, Gerry——"

"Lea' me 'lone, Shorlot!" came the indignant answer. Gerry was not in a mood for conversation.

CHAPTER XXII.

"Ecks!"

The O'Brien family were at their destination.

"Ah, Miss Denbigh, how charming of you now to come and meet us!"

The speaker was Mr. O'Brien, as he grasped Nora's hand, then turned to her sister:

"And how are you, Miss Elizabeth?"

"Quite well, thank you, Mr. O——"

"Dorlings, how o—r you?" sounded the voice of Mrs. O'Brien at this moment, as she rushed up and embraced both girls rapturously, adding, "Shorlot and Morg'ret, come here, and kiss the Miss Denbighs. You can't have forgotten the little girls you used to quorl with."

Thus pleasantly reminded of the bygone times they had spent together, the Denbigh and O'Brien girls kissed each other affectionately. Margaret then introduced "me brother," with whom Nora shook hands cordially, Elizabeth favoring him with a distant bow.

"And where is your luggage, Mrs. O'Brien?"

"There, at some distance, dorling—Gurldine's minding it. We brought no trunks with us. Mr. O'Brine declared he would not move a step out of Oirland if we did. So I packed all we needed into ten carpet bags. Me dear, they almost killed us. Gurldine was smothered twice. But what were these disagreeables compared to the knowledge that Mr. O'Brine's gouty leg was under one of them all the way?"

Were it possible to give the reader an idea of the manner in which Mrs. O'Brien delivered herself of this speech, he would probably admit he had never seen a better bit of comedy; but therein lies the "disagreeable" of writing, that what is best in life loses in being penned.

"Sit down, dear, and I'll call Tom. You must make each other's acquaintance."

The speaker was Nora, as she led Miss Geraldine O'Brien into the drawing room, then went in pursuit of Tom.

"Tom! Tom!" sounded her voice in the garden.

Meanwhile Tom was not there, but in the next room to Miss O'Brien. In another moment, passing the drawing room, he saw that young lady. With much gravity he approached the sofa.

"Who are you, little girl?"

No young man of eight could have put the question more politely; no young lady of eight could have bounded more indignantly from her seat.

"Little! I'm not littler than you! Measure!"

To place back to back was the work of a moment, and proved that Miss O'Brien's calculation was correct.

"What is your name?" asked Tom.

"Me name is Gurldine."

"Geraldine what?"

"Me entoyer name is Gurldine Durfy O'Brine."

Miss O'Brien curtailed the last name into a dissyllable, and gave the French prefix "D'Urfe," an equally Hibernian pronunciation.

"What's Durfy?" asked Tom, dryly.

"Durfy? Don't ye know Frinch?" asked the owner of the unique nose.

"No. Do you?"

"I?—I never learnt. But ye 'magined yerself so big, I thought maybe ye knew more than me."

Was it possible Miss "O'Brine's" nose was rising?

"Is Durfy French?" calmly continued Tom, his inquisitiveness by no means lessened by this satirical outburst.

"It is."

"And why is your name French, Geraldine?"

"Me name is Gurldine, and me name's O'Brine; that's Oirish, isn't it?"

"But Durfy?"

"That's Frinch—'cause we're of Frinch disthraction. An' now I hope ye're satisfied."

Tom Denbigh wasn't; but there was something in his companion's tone that made him deem it wise to drop further inquiry.

"Ar-rent ye satisfied?" asked the little girl.

This was encouragement.

"How do you spell Durfy, Geraldine?"

"May be ye'll naderstand if ye see 'it written," and Miss O'Brien dived into her pocket, and produced a small, soiled note-book, on a leaf of which she wrote, in a clear, boyish hand, "Geraldine d'Urfe O'Brien."

"Do ye understand now? Did ye iver see a name like that?"

"Yes; at home, in Ireland. I knew a little boy named O'Brien; but he had no French destruction about him, if that's what Durfy means."

"Frinch disthraction, I said. A common child, eh?"

"He wasn't a grand child. I knew lots of O'Briens in Ireland. O'Brien's a very common Irish name, my aunt says."

"If it's low she means, O'Brine's not low; and if ye mean to say we're low——"

Tom winced.

"Indeed I don't, Geraldine. Are you going to play with me?"

"I am. I like ye, Tom."

With this astounding announcement the young lady jumped up and kissed Mr. Denbigh, who, "en homme gallant," returned the embrace nothing loath. Thus was an acquaintance struck up between Mr. Tom Denbigh and Miss Geraldine O'Brien.

Princess and New Woman.

The young crown princess of Saxony is probably the nearest approach to new womanhood that the little kingdom can boast of, though her latest escapade certainly does not seem very daring to such of us as are accustomed to read of princesses, not to mention countesses, a-wheel. It appears then that not very long ago the queen of Saxony (Princess Louise's aunt by marriage) came to hear in some roundabout way that her royal niece had actually taken to riding a bicycle in the seclusion of her own grounds. A terrible scene between the two ladies then ensued, at the end of which Princess Louise declared if she might not bicycle neither would she dance, and she actually kept her resolution to the extent of staying away from several state balls. Her recent appearance at the last one, radiant as ever and dancing merrily, has made Dresden society wonder if her royal highness has not, as usual, managed to get her own way and ride her machine in triumph.

There was a squirrel sitting on a bush in Central Park. A man who came along took a pocket camera from his pocket and aimed it at the squirrel; the squirrel sat perfectly still. Snap! went the camera and the man put it back in his pocket. Then the man held out a nut to the squirrel. The squirrel came down promptly and took the nut from the man's fingers. It was all as though the squirrel had sat perfectly still for its picture in expectation of the under stood reward.—New York Sun.

"PALACE OF PROGRESS."

Great Revolving Tower for the Paris Exposition in 1900.

After much casting about for an idea, France has decided to astonish visitors to the Paris Exposition of A. D. 2000 with an immense revolving tower 400 feet high. The inventor is M. Devic, and he calls his tower the "Palace of Progress."

This extraordinary sort of a structure is shown in the architect's perspective drawing. The outer room of the building will move at the rate of 1.1175 meters, or about 3 feet 8 inches, per second, which is as nearly as possible two and one-half miles an hour. A complete revolution will thus occupy about two minutes, and the views of Paris and of the hills and plains of the Seine and Marne country will change as rapidly as the scenery changes when one is strolling slowly along a road. The rotary building will be only half the height of the Eiffel Tower, but, as it is to be erected near the summit of Montmartre, the highest point within the fortifications, it will command a broad view, cut only by the tower of the new church on the apex. The bearings are said by the mechanical engineers who have prepared the specifications to be so designed as to absolutely assure the absence of all sense of motion. When you are not looking out at the view you will be as tranquil as in any other building, but when you swing your chair so that you face the window you enjoy a serene motion and contemplate a constantly changing spectacle.

The motive power which will supply the force necessary to turn the structure will be hydraulic, and its cost has been calculated to be only 87.12 francs per hour, although each time that the movement is checked the hydraulic pressure needed to give it a new impulse will represent an expenditure of 232.80 francs.

PARIS REVOLVING TOWER.

The upper part of the building will be occupied by a public ball room, to be open from 11 o'clock in the evening until 2 in the morning, and the space immediately below this for an artificial skating rink, so that the allurements of the Palais de Glace on the Pole Nord will be added to those of the Moulin Rouge and the Casino de Paris.

EXPRESS WAGON OF THE ORIENT

The Herculean Turkish Porter Whose Place of Business Is on the Street.

The Turkish porter is one of the most interesting objects seen in a tour of the orient. Of herculean strength and power of endurance, he is usually prompt and obliging, also honest so far as in him lies. He cannot speak the truth, and would not respect himself if he could, for that is a virtue of the Frank. His place of business is on the streets of his native town, where he can be found at all hours of the day, clad in a loose soiled jacket usually gray, with gray gaiters, Turkish shoes or sandals, the inevitable fez and a neckerchief that makes him look as if he were strangling. All the burden of conveying large or small articles falls upon him and he will carry a piano as easily as a trunk. He is the most contented of the working fraternity one meets abroad. His occasional smoke under the shade of a mulberry tree, or his lazy sips of sherbet, are treats that renew his strength for the hard work by which he must live.

HUMAN EXPRESS WAGON.

FIREMEN'S ADVANCE GUARD.

Motor Carriages Used by the Berlin Fire Department.

The Berlin Fire Department, which is considered the model fire department of Europe on account of its excellent organization, its great attention to the improvement of apparatus by carefully watching the progress of science, has but recently introduced for some purposes the Ganswindt motor carriage, which is propelled by foot power. The apparatus, after having been thoroughly tested, has been found to be very efficient, and is now being rapidly introduced into the fire departments of all the German capitals. A squad known as the advance guard, consisting of six men, is mounted on one of these motor carriages, which is always ready at the door of the fire station. The men are in their places ready to start at the first signal. The two first ones attend to its girding, one to the steering and the other to ringing the bell. The six men stand in pairs upon long treadles, and by alternately raising and lowering their feet the movement is transmitted by means of strong belts upon a horizontal mechanism, the active power being considerably increased by spiral springs and ratchets attached to the axis and by a very clever arrangement of the leverage. The entire motor carriage is built as lightly as possible of steel tubing and hickory wood.

FIREMEN ON THE WAY TO A FIRE.

The machine was for more than a month sent out with the regular fire patrol, and it was found that the carriage rides very easily and safely; that it proceeds faster than the patrol wagon, drawn by horses, and that if the distance is not entirely too great the men arrive at the fire in excellent condition for their arduous duties.

A Family Romance.

S. J. Elsey, a veteran of the Mexican and civil wars, who for the past decade has lived at the Soldiers' Home in Leavenworth, Kan., and for the best part of a lifetime has believed himself alone in the world, was rejoiced the other day when a brother whom he thought had been killed in the war found him and offered him a home. He and his father and two brothers had entered the Mexican war. He had helped to bury the father and one brother after a battle, and he had heard that the other brother also was killed. After the civil war he lived only for himself and brought up at the Soldiers' Home; but the brother who had not been killed married, toiled and prospered at Hilliard Station, Ohio, and at last went to Leavenworth.

Takes the Palm for Meanness.

I have a neighbor, says an Ohio man, who cannot be excelled for meanness. He has three children and his wife, who, wholly unlike him, insists that presents shall be given them each Christmas. Four years ago he was practically coerced into allowing the purchase of a few toys. A few days after Christmas the children had lost all of these toys, and the father whipped them for losing them. The next Christmas he brought home some toys, duplicates of those given the previous year. In a few days they were lost, the children again whipped, and nothing more was seen of them until the following Christmas, when they once more did duty for Santa Claus. Since then the mother acts as custodian to prevent the father from stealing his children's toys.

Better than Gold Mining.

Some feathers that are extremely fashionable are worth more than their weight in gold. The hunting of birds on which these feathers are found is, moreover, more profitable than gold seeking. It is natural to compare the two, for both gold and egret feathers are found in Lower California.

These feathers sell at from $32 to $35 an ounce at wholesale, but, of course, they bring twice as much at retail over the counters of the great stores in New York and other cities. Even the heron's feathers come high. They are worth at wholesale from $8 to $10 an ounce. One heron will often yield feathers worth $150. If herons are more plentiful than egret they are more profitable hunting, because there is only a small tuft of covering on the egret that is marketable.

He Was the King of Smokers.

Klaes, the merchant of Rotterdam, was called the king of smokers, from his devotion to the gentle weed, and he had a right regal funeral. By the terms of his will, every smoker who chose to attend it was presented with ten pounds of tobacco and two Dutch pipes, on which were engraved the name, arms and date of the decease of the testator. All his guests were invited to be careful to keep their pipes alight during the funeral ceremonies, and to empty their ashes into the grave. His oak coffin was lined with the cedar of his old Havana cigar boxes, and a packet of old Dutch tobacco was placed at the foot of his coffin. His favorite pipe was laid by his side along with a box of matches, as well as flint and steel and some tinder.

Dangerous Work.

The under-water section of the Blackwell Tunnel, under the Thames, the largest tunnel ever built, has just been finished. It is twenty-seven feet in diameter and one mile in length, and connects Poplar on the north side of the river with Greenwich on the south. Nearly four thousand feet of this tunnel had to be driven by compressed air. The accuracy of the survey and the danger of the work may be imagined from the statement of the engineers that while driving under the river bed there were, at one time, but five feet and two inches of earth between the tunnel and the water. So great was the danger of the water bursting through that large quantities of clay were dumped into the river over the thinnest spots.

Did the Georgia Election.

The returns are not complete as yet, but enough have come in to show that the democrats have carried Georgia by about 40,000 plurality. It will take a day or two to get in the full returns.

FLORIDA.

The election in Florida was a day earlier than that in Georgia, being on Tuesday. But the voting precincts are scattered and returns come in slow. So far the indications are that the democrats will have a majority of over 20,000. But the vote was very light. Several thinly settled counties on the seacoast gave but little attention to the election, as the recent great storms had swept over them and they had to stay at home and rebuild their wrecked homes. The democrats will have 60 out of 68 members of the house of representatives and all of the 32 members of the state senate.

Married.

Miss Anna Shoudel and Mr. J. H. Schunk Joined in Wedlock.

The beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. M. Shoudel near Jackson Center was the scene of an enjoyable occasion Tuesday it being the joining in the bonds of holy matrimony of their daughter Miss Anna, to Mr. John B. Schunk of Garrett. The cermony was performed at 12 m. in the presence of more than a hundred friends and neighbors. The happy couple never looked prettier than when they appeared and took their position underneath a large bell and wreath of smilax while Miss Edith Schunk played the wedding march. On either side of them were the bridesmaids, Miss Mary Shoudel, sister of the bride and Miss Myrtle Boots, and the groomsman, Albert Peters and Mike Shoudel brother of the bride. Rev. Fred Keller of the German Lutheron church Auburn performed the ceremony in his usual pleasing manner, after which congratulations were showered upon them.

The party were then invited to the dining room where dinner was served. It has never been the writer's privliege to enjoy a dinner where the table contained so much or such a variety as on this occasion. After dinner there were also cigars and other refreshments which were indulged in by all. Mr. and Mrs. Schunk were presented with many lovely presents and in the aggregate would amount to many dollars. The bride looked lovely in a white silk dress trimmed in lace and satin ribbon while the groom appeared in the regulation black dress suit. They are both highly respected young people and will make their future home in Garrett, where Mr. Schunk is a trusted mechanic in the B. & O. shops and commands a handsome salary.

Besides the neighbors and friends from the country there were present Mr. and Mrs Joworsche and family, Mr. and Mrs. Pierce Otto and Jos. Kline of Fort Wayne, Mr. and Mrs. Sherman Trail of Waterloo, Mr. and Mrs. John Schunk and family, Mr. and Mrs. Chas Treesh and family, Mr. and Mrs. John Bartels and Miss Katy Bartels of, Garrett, and Mr. and Mrs. M. F. Long, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Stroh, Mr. and Mrs. Chas Bartels, Mrs. S. S. Potter, Mrs. J. E. Beaty, Misses Emma and Mary Snell, Lina Bartles and Chas Bartles of Auburn.

THEY DODGE TAXES.

THE "HONEST MONEY" MEN OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO.

Public Plunderers to Shield Themselves Within the Folds of Old Glory—Waving the Flag with One Hand and Plundering with the Other.

Chicago, Sept. 28, 1896.—Special.—The Chicago gold bug papers announce that a movement is on foot to decorate the streets with American flags and bunting in honor of the "honest money campaign."

Imitation is the sincerest flattery. The flag adjunct to the gold standard cause had its start one afternoon in the New York Stock exchange. The zealous patriots and patrons of American labor and industry who compose this exchange had finished a hard day's work. They had hammered down several industrial stocks on encouraging McKinley news, and were feeling good. A leading gold broker was seized with an inspiration. Pinning a McKinley badge to his breast, he produced an American flag and marched around the hall. Other stock brokers and money lenders followed him. The press accounts declared "that scores of well known Democratic stock brokers tore Bryan badges from their breasts and joined in the parade."

This was the inception of the flag movement in behalf of honest money. It must have been an inspiring sight. Future generations will shed tears when they read how Mr. Ickleheimer, of the well known firm of Heidelbach, Ickleheimer & Co. (maintainers of the national credit), dashed his Bryan button on the floor, and declared for McKinley, honesty, sound money and for his beloved country.

Bluff old Ben Johnson once said: "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel."

A modern philosopher declared that "Waving the flag with one hand and plundering the pockets of the people with the other is a form of patriotism which is becoming altogether too common in this country."

The honest money men of Chicago should lose no time in spanning the down-town streets with flags. Next to honest assessments the Chicago millionaire loves honest money.

Let us throw a little light in on these "honest money" citizens who are about to slop over with patriotism. You will get no information concerning them by reading the Chicago papers. Here are a few facts about Chicago millionaires who are now raising a corruption fund to insure the triumph of honest money:

Without an exception they are tax dodgers.

By systematic bribery, perjury and fraud they evade the payment of their taxes and throw the burden of maintaining government on the small property holders and the working classes.

By reason of these crimes on the part of Chicago honest money millionaires, the city treasury is bankrupt, the streets are unpaved, and unswept, public school facilities are lacking, and the various municipal departments are the laughing stock of other cities and a disgrace to Chicago.

Every tax dodger in Chicago is for McKinley, honest money and a permanent gold standard.

They should raise the flags at once. It will not be the first time the folds of Old Glory have shielded public plunderers.

In 1872, after the great fire had swept out of existence the larger part of the city, the assessed valuation of Chicago was $347,000,000. The population was less than 400,000.

Today, twenty-four years later, with a population of not less than 1,600,000, Chicago property is assessed at $237,000,000. Look back at those figures of 1872. What do you think of it? According to the sworn statements of Chicago property owners the city is worth $100,000,000 less today than it was twenty-four years ago. It may be that this is on account of the crime of 1873. If so, it is a bad showing for the gold standard.

Property in the down-town district which recently sold for $750,000 is scheduled and assessed at $65,000. Great railroad corporations owning city real estate and property worth $25,000,000 are assessed at $300,000. One piece of property—a sixteen story building—worth $1,250,000, pays taxes on $65,000.

There are some honest money people for you. They are going to drape their buildings with flags and proclaim to the open-mouthed world their honesty, purity and patriotism. They are not in favor of repudiation. They demand that the people of the United States shall pay their debts. They insist that every American dollar shall be just as good as any other American dollar—unless it is is invested in their buildings. They are the guardinas of the public morals; the keepers of the public conscience.

Who has to pay the taxes which these millionaires evade? The farmers of Illinois. His farm is assessed at nearly its full value. What is left after the Chicago board of trade has absorbed its share of plunder, is taken by the tax collector and poured into the public treasury to be expended in protecting the property of Chicago's honest money patriots.

Waving a flag with one hand and plundering the people with another is a good form of patriotism which is becoming altogether too common in this country.

Mr. Bryan.

The chairman of the Democratic Allen county central committee is in receipt of the following telegram which explains itself:

Model Worker.

Moody Says Christians Should Emulate Bryan's Methods.

D. L. Moody, the famous evangelist, who spoke to an immense crowd at Tremont Temple, in Boston, held up Candidate Bryan's campaign methods as a model for the Christian worker. His subject was announced to be "How to Reach the 40,000,000 of Non-church Goers in the Uninted States."

Mr. Moody urged the ministers to do like Bryan, and throw away their manuscripts. He said he heard the Democratic candidate last week. He liked his way. He liked his manner. He stirred people and he was down in earnest. Referring to what the politician had accomplished in the last sixty days, the evangelist asserted that the same thing could be done in religion if the church would wake up to it. "If the church of God is quickened," said Mr. Moody, "this country will be blessed within thirty days without waiting for election.

Sneaking Business

The COURIER as a loyal democratic paper, and the oldest and most extensively read in the county, has often had occasion to complain of scurvy treatment on the part of democrats and democratic officers it has worked to help elect. For in spite of all these things, which should favor the COURIER and the publisher, these men have lost few opportunities to hit the COURIER a slap. They have had an especial weakness for giving public patronage to new men and new papers, evidently overlooking the fact that a new man had no acquaintance in the county and therefore no influence either way, and would besides, have but a limited circulation. We have suffered these indignities for many years, off and on, and kept silent. We feel now that self-respect demands a protest from us.

This morning the three election commissioners met quietly and let the contract for all the election printing to Mr. Gardner of the Butler Herald. We had had several talks with the election commissioners, and asked for the printing of the official local ballots. We did not ask to hog the whole thing, but distinctly said that the work should be so divided that the official ballots should come here where all the commissioners reside, who have to count and seal them. But they met to-day as we said, D. D. Moody and D. M. Link, democrats, and A. L. Kuhlman, republican. Kuhlman evidently "wasn't in it" as a member of the election board. Mr. Gardner was here, but we cannot say whether he was present or not. But any one can judge whether this is decent treatment to us or other democratic papers.

As we remarked at first, this sort of thing occurs pretty often, about as often as the opportunity. A sample case was the publishing of the delinquent tax list by the auditor last winter in the Butler Herald, Mr. Gardner's paper. That paper has only a local and limited circulation, and the lands advertised were brought to the attention of but a few of the many. Any man was liable to have his land sold for taxes without knowing it had been advertised. No doubt some did. The COURIER, on the other hand, has subscribers in every school district in the county, a club in every postoffice in the county, and at every postoffice near the line outside of the county. These things are not only an injustice to the COURIER, but to the people of the county, and are on the same line with sending all the job work of the county offices to Indianapolis—a thing that officers of both parties have done for many years. What has Burford, of Indianapolis, done for DeKalb county officers that he should have the patronage so greatly needed by home offices? What has Mr. Gardner, of the Butler Herald, done to help Mr. Moody into office several times? He was not here. What excuse can Mr. Link and Mr. Moody give to the other papers for this partiality? We know it is not very dignified to be complaining of acts of even such manifest injustice, but it seems to be the only defense. If those "clothed with a little brief authority" think the people are not going to express an opinion on such transactions, they are mistaken. Patience may be very desirable, but it has a limit.

In Doubt.

BUTLER.

A few of our people attended the Angola fair. They report a rather a good fair but weather too cold for outdoor amusement.

E. V. Campbell has gone to Toledo to attend medical college.

Last Friday night fire broke out in an old building at the rear of Ben Stiefel's three story brick building, occupied by Mr. Morley as a hearse store room and cabinet shop. The strange part of the affair is that the fire started in the hearse and most probably was intentional on the part of some one. There was $500 insurance in the Phoenix Insurance Co's. Auxiliary which will cover all damages. The building a very poor one, was not insured.

Mrs. Hose, wife of Isaac Hose, died last Wednesday after a brief illness of inflammation of the bowels. Her funeral took place last Thursday from the U. B. church of which society she was a devoted member, and a successful teacher in their Sabbath school; Rev. Smith officiating. The remains were followed to the cemetery by a very large concourse of relatives and friends. The Rathbone Sisters and the members of the K. of P. lodge attending in a body. She was an estimable lady, and will be missed by many. She leaves a husband, brothers and a sister, but no children.

Died at the residence of his son, one mile east of Butler, Oct. 7, 1896. In the ninety-first year of his age John Jacob Gunsenhouser. The deceased was born in the Canton of Basel, Switzerland, May 28, 1806, lived there with his parents until April 8, 1816, when with his parents and 600 other steerage passengers they sailed from Amsterdam in a sailing vessel under Captain Smith. On Aug. 28 of the same year, they landed at Philadelphia. His father was $200, in debt, and the whole family was held subject to sale for passage. A good friend of the family one Jacob Snyder that they had known in the old country, happened to look over the high fence where they were detained, went out among his friends and raised the $200, purchased their freedom and took the whole family home with him to Lancaster Co. Pa. They lived there seven years. He became a member of the German Reformed Lutheran church 1823. He removed to Stark, Co. O., in 1824, and on June, 14, 1827, was united in marriage to Mary Strole. To them were born eleven children, nine surviving him. The year after his marriage he removed to Chippewa, in Wayne Co., and after an arduous years work at his trade, had succeeded in saving $5, with this and $20 borrowed from two friends, he built a house in Doylestown. About a year afterward he sold out and removed again to Stark, Co. and bough 80 acres of land for $280. This after seven years he sold for $1350, and with this money in 1836, he removed to DeKalb Co. Ind. and settled two miles east of Butler, where he entered three quarter sections of land, and had $200, left. His house consisted of four posts set in the ground, muslin cloth stretched around three sides of it, a shirred roof and a log heap in front. His family now consisted of his wife, five children, two of his wifes sisters and one of her brothers. The bed room for the women and children was a large wagon box. With the help of the women and children, a rude cabin was erected, but before it was completed, their old house burned down, when they were compelled to move into the hog pen, which had neither door, window, floor, or chimney, and cold weather was approaching. In the fall of 1843, he started with an ox team for Jackson Prairie, where he bought wheat at 1.25 per bushel, and drove on to Monokomon, where he bought some corn and had to go seven miles further into Michigan to get it ground. He got his load and started home. It began to grow cold and ice formed in the road and his oxen's feet became sore, finally when near Hamilton his wagon mired, and he was compelled to abandon his wagon and load. He left his team at Joseph Bogus' and carried what he could home to his family. The following day he and his brother-in-law make another trip to the wagon and carried a part home. The wagon remaining frozen in the slough, for about a week but no part of his flour or meal was stolen. His adventures were many and interesting, but space will not allow recounting them. He lived on his old farm until about 18 years ago when he sold it, and bought the place where he died. His funeral took place from Big Run Chapel on his old farm, by Rev. Smith of the U. B. church, of which he had long been a leading member and his remains were interred in the cemetery on his old farm. Father Gunsenhouser as he has long been known was a man of sterling integrity, a christian of unswerving devotion, a man of unblemished character. He leaves to mourn his departure the aged partner of his youth, nine children fifty-two grandchildren and thirty-seven great grandchildren and a large number of friends, neighbors and acquaintances.

Bryan Said.

In his speech in the House of Representatives Feb. 14, 1895 in apposing further issues of bonds, Mr. Bryan said.

Neither are we willing by authorizing bonds for the purchase of gold, to pledge the government to such a policy which discriminates against silver as a standard money and recognizes gold as the only money of ultimate redemption. So long as the note holder is allowed to choose the coin in which he is to be paid, so long will it be futile to attempt to maintain a gold reserve.

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. Mrs. W. An Ideal Panacea.

James L. Francis, Alderman, Chicago writes: "I regard Dr. King's New Discovery as an Ideal Panacea for Coughs Colds and Lung complaints, having used it in my family for the last five years to the exclusion of physician's prescriptions or other preparations."

Rev John Burgus, Keokuk, Iowa, writes: "I have been a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church for 50 years or more and have never found any thing so beneficial, or that gave me such speedy relief as Dr. King's New Discovery. Try this Ideal Cough Remedy now. Trial bottles free at Robbins & McCords Drug Store. 6

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

We have heard it said that republicans are offering a vote for all the rest of the county ticket for one vote for sheriff. But we apprehend they are wasting their time. LINES.

ON THE DEATH OF EVA ENSLEY.

It seemed so sad, that in her bloom
Our dear one had to go.
When in the church and in the home
We learned to need her so.

But soon the time we know will come
When death and sickness cease
Those enemies, Christ will destroy
And give us life and peace.

Soon will we meet our loved on high
As free from care and pain,
United we shall all be home.
Where Jesus, Lord, shall reign.

To Subscribers.

Subscribers to the Weekly COURIER are getting careless and allowing their dues to get way behind. This is not wisdom nor justice. It will be wise to keep it from getting too big, and justice to the printer who always has use for the money. We do not complain of those who find it hard work to get the money. But we have several hundred who are able to pay and they should see to it without delay. They could attend to this when they come to pay taxes. Let us hear from you.

Burned.

A little daughter of Marion Shutt, in Jackson township, was badly burned a few days ago. They were butchering and the little girl and her baby brother were playing near the fire, when her clothes caught fire. She was cool enough to drag the little one out of danger, and her mother hearing her scream, ran and saved her, quenching the flames. Dr. Buchtel says she is badly burned on the side and back, but he hopes to save her.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. A Churn That Churns in One Minute

I have been in the dairy business all my life and have many times churned for an hour before butter would appear, so when I heard of a churn that would churn in a minute, I concluded to try it Every day for a week I used it, and not only could I churn in a minute, but I got more and better butter than with the common churn. This is very important information to butter makers. The churn works easily and will churn an ordinary churning in less than sixty seconds. I have sold two dozen of these churns in the past month, Every butter maker that has seen me churn in less than a minute bought one. You can obtain all desired information regarding the churn by addressing J. F. Casey & Co., St Louis Mo., and they will give you prompt and courteous attention.

About three years ago M. Moissan manufactured minute diamonds by heating iron and carbon together at a very high temperature and under great pressure. It recently occurred to another French chemist that the conditions under which very hard steels are now made should also result in the formation of diamonds, and an examination of a large number of samples of steel has shown that this is really the case. By dissolving the steel in very strong acids minute crystals presenting all the characteristics of true diamonds have been obtained. None of the crystals is more than one-fiftieth of an inch in diameter, but there is a possibility that larger ones will presently be found.

Why the Pacific Was Not Bridged.

A retired politician living in Pittsburg supplies this interesting anecdote of another citizen of the town:

James W. Nye, who was appointed territorial governor of Nevada by President Lincoln in 1861, was at the time of his selection to the office living in New York city. A lawyer of national repute and a prominent figure in New York politics, he had a wide circle of undesirable political "strikers" and acquaintances. Some fifty or sixty of these followed him, by devious ways, to his new home in the West, all expecting to subsist on the crumbs that fell from the gubernatorial table. When Governor Nye had been in office a couple of weeks he was waited upon by a committee from this crowd, and informed that they were there ready "to be appointed" to any office that he might have to offer; and that in the meantime he would be allowed to provide for their board and maintenance. Nye grasped the situation immediately and organized the whole outfit into a surveying corps, giving them the work of surveying an impossible route over the Sierra mountains. After they had gone he sent for Winnemucca, a bloodthirsty Piute chief, and told the warrior to head the gang off and to never let him hear of their getting back to Carson City.

After an interval of several days Winnemucca reported that he couldn't catch them. Soon after "Jim" Meary, the head of the expedition, put in an appearance and reported to the Governor the success of the undertaking.

"Well, Bill," said Jim, "we've got to the Pacific ocean. What'll we do now?"

"Bridge it, sir; bridge it, and go on."

But as "Jim" was the only member of the party who had the temerity to come back for further instructions the Pacific remained unbridged. The others reached San Francisco and decided that it was not conducive to health to bother Nevada's Governor or the Piute chief again.—Pittsburg Leader.

THE STRANGERS' DEAD BABY.

Mute Sympathy Proved that They Had Unknown Friends.

Monday, before the day's bustle had begun, says a Tacoma paper, a newspaper man saw passing along the opposite side of the street a man going riverward, bearing in his arms a tiny coffin. His face bore the impress of intense sorrow, while down his cheeks ran the hot tears, which so dimmed his vision that, in spite of his endeavors, his steps were wavering as he went onward with his precious burden. At his side was a woman, evidently sorrow-stricken, but who spoke, soothingly as her heart could, words of comfort to the all but fainting man at her side. They were man and wife, strangers here, and the burden that he bore was their only child, that, in the evening before, had suddenly died. Behind them followed a friend, upon whose shoulders was the rough pine box in which the little coffin was soon to be placed. This was all there was of display or of cortege—three of them and the dead baby! That they were poor, there was no question. That they were strangers; that there was dearth of sympathy and countenance of their loss by the world about them, was most apparent. Some one—great-hearted and kind—standing near, said:

"Perhaps they have need of help; let us go and see."

Another said: "None seem to know them."

Then some one asked: "Have they no friends in their distress?"

The answer to the questioning came quickly; for, impulsively, the reporter and those near him stepped behind the man who carried the rude pine box. Soon another and yet another joined in the procession as it passed onward up Water street. Spontaneously, so it seemed, people joined the cortege—why, they knew not—from shop, saloon, storehouse and office, so that by the time the wharf was reached there was a great crowd of our people who, moved by a common impulse, were there showing by their kindly ways the ever present sympathy in the human heart for other hearts in sorrow and distress. And when the tiny coffin had been placed, by hands the parents never knew, in the little pine box preparatory to being put on the Willapa boat, a lad who had just landed a cargo of fragrant flowers, for sale upon the streets, placed a wealth of white lilies and forget-me-nots over the baby's quiet breast. The mother looked her unutterable thanks, while the father, after silently gazing into the sympathetic faces about him, turned his tearful eyes heavenward and said prayerfully:

"Blessed be the name of the Lord! Though I am in the land of the stranger, yet I am surrounded by friends."

Napoleon in Palestine.

The expedition of Napoleon Bonaparte to Egypt at the end of the last century, during which he also invaded Palestine, has been denominated by historians as "a wild goose chase," and it certainly ended in disastrous failure, Napoleon deserting his army and returning to France, leaving the men to shift for themselves. During his occupation of Palestine he is charged with massacreing from 3,000 to 4,000 Turkish prisoners; he is also charged with poisoning about 2,000 of his own wounded, whom he could not transport in his retreat from Palestine. It is a curious illustration, however, of the uncertainty of history, that both statements are denied, and how much truth there may be in them can not now be absolutely ascertained.

A Quick Witness.

Attorney (examining witness)—You say you saw the shots fired?

Witness—Yes, sir.

"How near were you to the scene of the affray?"

"When the first shot was fired I was about ten feet from the shooter."

"Ten feet. Well, now, tell the court where you were when the second shot was fired."

"I didn't measure the distance."

"Speaking approximately, how far should you say?"

"Well, it approximated to half a mile."

HOW HE MAKES MONEY

BONDS ISSUED BY UNCLE SAM NEVER REDEEMED.

Profit on Unredeemed Notes and Certificates Is Enormous—Money Orders, Stamps and Bills Which Are Lost.

Sources of Income.

Washington correspondence:

Uncle Sam owes millions of dollars which he will never pay. Still, his credit is good. He has not refused to pay the millions which are overdue. If you could present his I. O. U.'s at the Treasury Department tomorrow, he would pay you very promptly the $1,700,000 which he owes to the people who have bought bonds now overdue. But no one can present all these securities, because most of them, it is quite evident, have been destroyed. Some have been dissolved in the ocean; some have been consumed by fire; some have been eaten by mice; some have been torn up by babies; some have been hidden so securely that they will probably not be found until dry-rot has made them unrecognizable. Nevertheless, every few years some of the Government's old securities turn up at the treasury for redemption. It was not very many years ago that the owner of a very large amount of Texas indemnity stock, who considered himself very poor, collected from the Government on them many thousand dollars. There is still $20,000 worth of the Texas indemnity stock outstanding. None was presented to the treasury last year or the year before. None of the very old bonds came in last year, and of the debt prior to the 1847 loan none has come in since 1869, though there is $151,745.26 outstanding. No one will ever call for this amount, and it can be figured as part of Uncle Sam's bond profits.

Of the loan of 1847, $47,900 has been redeemed since 1869, and there is only $950 outstanding. Of the loan of 1858 there is only $2,000 outstanding. The Government did not do any heavy borrowing until the civil war, and its first big bond issue was what are known as the "5—20s of 1862." There were $391,600,600 of these issued, bearing 6 per cent. interest. It was not until Dec. 1, 1871, that the Government felt like beginning to pay its war debts. On that date it called in $99,959,600 worth of the 5—20s of 1862, and most of these were presented at the time named in the call. But a great many thousand dollars' worth of them were held for many years, drawing no interest; and to-day there is outstanding $18,500 worth of the bonds called in 1871. Few, if any, of these will ever be presented for redemption. Meantime, the interest which the Government has not paid for the use of this money amounts to $26,400 at single interest alone. What it would aggregate at compound interest I leave any one who is interested to determine.

IN A BAD CONDITION.

UNCLE SAM'S PROFIT ON UNREDEEMED NOTES AND CERTIFICATES.

Never Will Be Presented.

Altogether, of the amount borrowed in 1862 (nearly four hundred millions), $220,200 has never been called for, and probably never will be called for. To be sure, this is only about .17 of 1 per cent. of the loan, which is not a very big discount. The treasury officials do not look on the bond profit as considerable. Even the $1,700,000 now outstanding would not pay 2 per cent. of Uncle Sam's running expenses for a year. It would not keep the Government machinery going for more than a week.

The $220,200 outstanding on account of the loan of 1862 is the largest amount to be credited to any one loan, except the $44,300 balance of the funded loan of 1891 outstanding at the end of last year; but it is much too early to calculate on the profits of that loan. The treasury received $96,200 worth of bonds last year, and more are coming in all the time.

The oldest bonds presented for redemption last year were part of the loan of July and August, 1861. They were not called till 1881, and last year $7,400 worth were presented at the treasury. They had drawn no interest for nearly twenty-four years while they lay hidden in somebody's strong box. If they had continued to draw the original interest, they would have brought an income of $444 annually to their owner. The Government has made more than $10,000 in interest on these bonds, reckoning at single interest only.

These illustrations serve to show what the Government profit is. The treasury will make no less than a million dollars on bonds issued before 1895 never presented for redemption, and it has made as much more in unpaid interest up to date.

The officials of the Treasury Department would be very glad to have every loan paid within a week of its maturity, for under the present condition the loan account is never closed. With a view to keeping in touch with the Government's creditors, these officials encourage bond buyers to take registered rather than coupon bonds. Very few registered bonds are lost; and when there is a loss the Government seeks out the loser and encourages him to make application for the issue of a duplicate. When a coupon bond is lost the Government will not duplicate it.

Money in Currency.

The profit made by the Government on bonds is very small compared with the profit on unredeemed currency. Of course, no one will ever know just what amount of currency has been destroyed, but the treasury experts made an estimate for the benefit of Congress in the last administration, and expressed the belief that about $12,500,000 profit had accrued to the Government up to Jan. 1, 1891, from United States notes, gold and silver certificates and national bank notes which would not be presented for redemption.

This amount the experts distributed as follows:

National bank notes	$6,394,555
United States notes	5,410,541
Silver certificates	447,004
Total	$12,452,100

This amount, these experts now estimate, has been increased to about $15,000,000. In proportion to the amount of currency in circulation, the amount destroyed is not so great now as it was in war times, but there is much more in circulation now. The present estimated profit of the Government on paper currency destroyed is half a million dollars every year, despite the fact that the treasury makes every effort to redeem all the currency it issues. A special corps of experts is employed in the redemption division to examine the mutilated currency presented. It comes in, sometimes, in pulp, in ashes, in tatters, worn and torn. The experts work on it with microscopes, pull it apart and piece it together, making every possible effort to identify it. If a part of a torn bill is presented for redemption, the owner receives for it an amount proportioned to its percentage of the area of the entire note. If torn, burned fragments are sent in with satisfactory evidence that they are the sole remains of a certain sum of money, the entire amount is refunded.

The Government even sends special agents in some cases to investigate claims for the redemption of money; it redeems money which has been in birds' nests; money which has been in stoves; money which has been in goats' stomachs; money which has been in babies' mouths; money which has been used as a pipe-lighter; money which has been at the bottom of the sea—in fact, everything which is recognizable under the most minute scrutiny as a Government "promise to pay." At the time her Newport "palace" was burned Mrs. Vanderbilt sent some charred bills to the office of the redemption bureau, and the treasury experts succeeded in getting more than $2,000 out of them. But, in spite of all its efforts, the treasury grows richer by half a million dollars every year in unredeemed paper currency.

MONEY THAT THE GOVERNMENT REDEEMS.

Profit on Money Orders.

Another source of income to the Government is its unredeemed money orders. All money order funds are remitted to the sub-treasury at New York. A few years ago the Postoffice Department drew from the sub-treasury a lump sum of $1,250,000, which was the balance to the credit of money order funds in excess of the demands of current business. Last year a check for $519,244 was transferred to the Postoffice Department's balance in the treasury here, the excess to the credit of the money order fund in New York. These two sums and the working balance kept in New York represent what the Government has made indirectly out of this business. Probably its profits up to the present date amount to $2,000,000, but no exact statement will ever be made. There is a time limit of one year on the money order (or the postal order, as it is now called), but there is no limit of time on the issue of a duplicate. Therefore, the Postoffice Department receives every week for duplication postal notes and money orders which are several years old; 1880 money orders, which had been due for more than a year, were duplicated by the department in 1895.

If the difference between the money received and the money paid out by the money order bureau was an indication of the Government's indirect profit on the business, here is the way last year's account would stand:

Amount received	$156,709,089.77
Amount paid	156,344,460.21
Profits on lost money orders about	$364,629.56

This would be in addition to the Government's net revenue of $661,092.27 from fees on domestic money orders. But, as I have said, there is a variation in the balance from year to year, and the Government does not make $365,000 a year through the destruction of money orders.

Even if it did, this sum would not keep the postal service of the United States running much more than a day and a half. It costs nearly $10,000 an hour to carry Uncle Sam's mails.

Money in Stamps.

No one knows what the Government makes in unused stamps every year, but the profit must amount to several thousand dollars. Not an inconsiderable amount of this is due to stamp collectors, and when the Columbian stamps were issued the Postmaster General calculated that the entire cost of making new designs and engraving new plates, as well as the additional expense of printing the larger stamps, would be paid by collectors' purchases. The department was disappointed in this, but its receipts from collectors in the Columbian year are estimated at more than a million dollars.

The Postmaster General spoke freely of this source of income in his report, though he was disposed to say very little about his calculations before the stamps were issued. He was afraid some inconsiderate people might class the United States with those small nations and dependencies which rely on the stamp collector as much as on the tax collector. Every one of the eighteen dependencies of France has a full individual issue of stamps of thirteen denominations; and in Siberia, Tonga, the Cook Islands and other small countries the designs of stamps are changed whenever additional revenue is wanted. The philatelists protest, but their protests avail nothing.

Large amounts are made every year by the Government through the destruction of stamps and stamped envelopes which have not been used. How few take the trouble to remove a stamp from a misdirected envelopes? There is a good margin of profit, too, in excess payments on postal matter; for the Postoffice Department, while it always collects on underpaid mail, never refunds when there is too much postage paid.

To reckon all the profits which the Government has received unearned, it would be necessary to go over the records of Congress and get the list of claims which have been pronounced just by treasury officials, and by Senators and members who have investigated them. But those are not profits yet, for Congress may develop a conscience some day and pay them.

OLD-TIME MASONRY.

Arch of Burnt Brick Constructed 4,000 Years Before Christ.

Explorations made in the vicinity of the site of ancient Babylon by the University of Pennsylvania have resulted in the discovery of engineering work constructed 4,000 years before the time of Christ. In the accompanying cut an arch of burnt brick placed at the outlet of a drain under the foundation of the temple of Bel, which was found in the ruins of the ancient city of Nippur, is shown. The fixing of the date of the building of this arch means that primitive man must have existed many thousand years previously, certainly as early as 7,000 B. C., as the work bespeaks a high state of civilization.

This is naturally surprising to those who have been taught to believe that mankind has inhabited the earth for less than 6,000 years. This impression is not warranted by the Bible itself, and is not generally held by students of to-day. It is due to the fact that the Oxford Bible contains the chronology of Archbishop Usher, who died in 1656.

MASONRY LAID 6,000 YEARS AGO.

The archbishop calculated that the world was completed at 10 a. m., Sept. 7, 4004 B. C., and his conclusions, which were generally accepted by the scholars of the day, have been perpetuated in the chronology on the margin of the Oxford Bible. There is nothing in the Bible itself to fix the dates, and the recent discoveries are in no way in conflict with the testimony of the scriptures themselves.

These discoveries by the University of Pennsylvania have been the most interesting in archaeology which have been made. At a cost of $100,000 the university has made excavations where Babylon formerly existed and has added a great wealth of data to our knowledge of ancient civilizations. More than 25,000 tablets have been discovered which contain much information of value to biblical students and to Assyriologists.

Not to Be Overlooked.

In the field of domestic science and dietetics, we are a long way behind Germany. Not long ago that country established schools for teaching girls in factories, mills, and home service the details of housework and cooking. Even private establishments in the Kaiser's empire, in cases where the list of women and girl employes is long, maintain at their own expense training schools for those who are serving them. Though this is done from a purely selfish motive, it is significant as showing the commercial value of well-fed and well-kept laborers, a point that should not be overlooked by social economists.

Cross of the Legion.

Belfort, the eastern gate of France, and Rambervillers, in the Vosges Mountains, have just received the cross of the Legion of Honor, which will be emblazoned on the town arms, in honor of the gallant resistance they made to the Germans twenty-five years ago. Altogether, nine towns in France now have the cross of the Legion of Honor on their coat of arms.

Mystery of the St. Lawrence River.

For seven years the St. Lawrence river gradually decreases in depth; then for seven years it gradually increases in depth, the difference in level being about five feet. Why it does so no one has yet discovered.

MR. SEWALL'S LETTER

Arthur Sewall, Democratic candidate for Vice President of the United States has made public his letter of acceptance It is as follows:

Hon. Stephen B. White, Chairman, and members of the Notification Committee:

Gentlemen—I have the honor to accept in writing, as I have already verbally done the nomination tendered by you on behalf of the Democratic party as its candidate for Vice President of the United States. And in so doing I am glad, first, to express my satisfaction that the platform of our party, which has commanded my life-long allegiance, is honestly and fully declaratory of all the principles, and especially of the absorbing financial issue upon which, as you say, I took my stand when the hours of triumph seemed remote, and when arrogant money-changers throughout the world boasted that the conquest of the American masses was completed. These principles have been of late in abeyance, but only because those whom we trusted to maintain them have failed to do so. These principles can never die. We have rescued our party from those who, under the influence of the money power, have controlled and debased it. Our mission now is to rescue from this same power and its foreign allies our own beloved country. This is the first and highest duty imposed by our party's platform; upon the performance of this duty all other reforms must wait.

The test of party principles is the government they assure, the proof of good government is a contented and happy people, and the supreme test of both is the ability to guide the country through crises as well as to administer the government in ordinary times. Our people now face a crisis, a crisis more serious than any since the war. To what party shall they turn in their direst emergency? It is true that the present crisis may not involve all equally, that there are those who do not suffer now, and may not suffer should the crisis threatened by the gold standard come on in all its fury. Human selfishness makes these deaf to all appeals, but to these fortunately the Democratic party has never needed to appeal to win its battles, nor does it now, save as there are some among them who can rise superior to self in the sacrifice which such a crisis demands of every patriot. We are told that the country has prospered under the present monetary standard, that its wealth has enormously increased. Granted so, but in whose hands? In the hands of the toilers, the producers, the farmers, the miners, the fabricators in the factories, the framers of the nation's wealth in peace, its defenders in war? Have they the prosperity which was theirs so late as even twenty years ago? I deny it. They deny it. None affirm it save those whose interests it is to do so, whose profit would diminish as prosperity returns to those on whose distress they thrive.

"The Best Money in the World."

All is indeed right between capital and labor. The "best money in the world" is none too good for those who have got it, but how is it with the 90 per cent. of our people who have "got it to get?" How is it with those who must buy this "best money in the world" with the products of their own labor? These are the people for whom the Democratic party would legislate. What is the best money for these is the question for all to ask who really love this land. How else can you increase labor's purchasing power but by increasing the price of labor's product? Is it a fair measure of value that in our great producing section ten bushels of potatoes must be paid for a dollar, ten bushels of oats for a dollar, six bushels of corn for a dollar, three bushels of wheat and all other products of the soil and mines and the labor of all wage-earners at the same ratio? Does any fair mind say this is honest money that forces such an exchange, and if it is not a fair exchange is it honest, is it less than robbery?

This is the condition to which the single standard has brought us. Under it the appreciation of the "best money in the world" has increased the wealth of the rich, and for the same reason has increased the debt of the debtor. So it has been; so under the present standard it must continue to be. With these object lessons about us little need have we for history and statistics and the studies of scholars. Little satisfaction it is to us that they have warned us long since of the deadly evil of the gold standard. It has brought us at last to the parting of the ways. Whither shall the people go—in the way that has led to their enslavement or into that which offers them their only chance to regain individual liberty, lasting prosperity and happiness?

Let not our opponents charge us with creating class distinctions. Alas for the republic, they are already here, created by the Republican policy of the last thirty years, created by the very system we would now overthrow and destroy. Nor do we raise a sectional issue. The nomination you tender repels the charge. None knew better than I that this nomination is meant as no personal tribute, but as an assurance that our party is a non-sectional party. Not by our policy, but only by the continuance of the gold standard can sectionalism be revived.

Neither shall our opponents be permitted to terrify the people by predictions that temporary disturbance or panic will come from the policy we propose. The American people will be loyal to the nation's money, will stand behind and maintain it at whatever value they themselves may put upon it. Once before in the present generation have our people been called up to face a momentous crisis. What then said Mr. Lincoln, the chosen leader of the plain people of the land? Was he awed by threats or weakened by the wily persuasions of the false friends who, as to-day, pleaded for compromise with wrong. His answer was: "If our sense of duty forbids this, then let us stand by our duty fearlessly and effectively. Let us be diverted by none of these sophistical contrivances wherewith we are so industriously plied and belabored, contrivances such as groping for some middle ground between right and wrong, reverse the divine rule and calling not the sinners, but the righteous, to repentance, such as the invocation to Washington, imploring men to unsay what Washington said and undo what Washington did. Neither let us be slandered from our duty by false accusations against us. Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."

We know well the nature of the struggle in which we are engaged, we are anxious only that the people of the land shall understand it, and then our battle is won. Behind the strong entrenchment of the gold standard are gathered all those favored classes it has fostered, the only dangerous classes of the land. Avarice and unholy greed are there, every trust and combination is there. Every monopoly is there, led by the greatest monopoly of all, the monopoly of the power of gold. With us in our assault upon these intrenchments are all these unselfish men who, not now suffering themselves, cannot rest content with conditions so full of suffering for others, and that vaster number of our people who have been sacrificed to the small and selfish class who now resist their attempts to regain their ancient rights and liberties. These are the patriots of 1896, the foes of a "dishonest dollar," which enriches 10 per cent. of our people to rob the rest, the defenders of the homes of the land, the public morals and the public faith, both of which alike forbid the payment of Government obligations in a coin costlier to those who have to pay it than that the contract calls for, the defenders of the honor of the nation, whose most sacred charge is to care for the welfare of all its citizens.

The free and unlimited coinage of silver is the sole remedy with which to check the wrongs of to-day, to undo the ruin of the past, and for our inspiration we have the justice of our cause and those cherished principles of Jefferson and Jackson, which shall be our guide on our return to power. "Equal and exact justice to all men, absolute acquiescence in decisions of the majority, the vital principles of republics, the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith." Profoundly sensible of the high honor of the nomination you tender, I am, truly yours,

ARTHUR SEWALL.

JOYS OF MATERNITY.

VIGOROUS MOTHERS AND STURDY CHILDREN ADMIRED.

Why so Many Women Are Childless—A Problem That Has Puzzled Physicians for Centuries.

Reproduction is a law of nature, and no picture of joy and happiness can equal that of the vigorous mother and her sturdy child.

Nature makes but few mistakes, and every thoughtful person must admit that a cause exists, why so many women are childless. The subject baffles the theories of physicians. Such cases are curable nine times out of ten, as evidenced by thousands of letters on file at Mrs. Pinkham's office. Many a darling baby owes its existence to Mrs. Pinkham's advice and the Vegetable Compound. This is not to be wondered at when such testimony as the following explains itself:

"I have taken three bottles of your Vegetable Compound, one package of Sanative Wash, one box of Liver Pills; and now I have a dear little babe four weeks old, and I am well. I have to thank you for this.

"I have spent $200.00 for doctor's bills without obtaining any relief. For my cure I only spent $5.00.

"I had been a victim of female troubles in their worst form; suffered untold agonies every month; had to stay in bed, and have poultices applied, and then could not stand the pain.

"My physician told me if I became pregnant I would die. I had bladder trouble, itching, backache, catarrh of the stomach, hysteria and heart trouble, fainting spells and leucorrhœa. Can you wonder that I sing the praises of a medicine that has cured me of all these ills?"—MRS. GEO. C. KIRCHNER, 373 Belmont Ave., Brooklyn, N.Y.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

ST. JOHN'S EVE

Come, draw the chairs around the hearth, my lad,
What! it's but 10 o'clock, and all is bright?
If I had kept that strength that once I had,
They had been ranged there with the morning's light.
Just once a year, just once, poor souls! they're let
To cross the old home threshold, and to sit
Beside the fire, and here we don't forget;
I say, they're ready ere the lamps are lit!

Put the old grandsire's elbow-seat the first,
In the warm corner that he called his own;
And next the rocker, where thy mother nursed
Her first-born, proud as on a monarch's throne;
And then the little stool that she would draw
Close up to me as we sat laughing there,
And I would make as if I scarcely saw
The firelight dancing on her sunny hair.

Up there at Eno-gat the tall grass waves,
And the red roses glitter in the sun,
The three tall crosses mark the three green graves,
Where they lie quiet, life's hot battle done;
Old man, and matron, and unwedded maid,
For many a weary year of labor gone,
But they will rise, for all so deeply laid,
And seek us on the eve of good St. John.

Pour out three cups of the old cider, boy;
Put the three sweetest apples on the plate;
Bring flowers, to give the board a look of joy,
And then go rest while I sit here and wait;
I shall not greet them at the open door,
I shall not see them lift the heavy latch,
Nor hear their footsteps on the oaken floor,
Though eyes and ears are straining as I watch.

And yet, I think, as they come in at last,
That I shall know them near me once again,
And all the gladness of the dear dead past
Will beat once more in dulling heart and brain;
While age and weariness, like robes outworn,
Will drop from off me, and young, brave and true,
With wrongs forgiven and sweet hopes reborn,
I and my loved our lost lives will renew.

What, the old man is doting, is he lad?
Perhaps so; yet he'll have his willful way,
And give our rites the honor that they had,
Ere all was cold and scornful, as to-day!
See how the west is palling. Set the chairs,
And go; all round us must be still and dumb.
The saints are gracious when man trusts and dares;
My darling, oh, my darling, wilt thou come?

—Household Words.

A THIEF IN THE NIGHT

There was a large party at the Chateau de Kerdall, near Vannes.

The Marquis de Kerdall and his young wife had just returned from a tour of the world on their yacht, during which they had paid flying visits to Africa, America and Oceanica, and they had celebrated their home coming by gathering together all their friends and relatives at their beautiful country house.

Among the guests was old Dr. Cornabuc, an illustrious member of the Academy of Metaphysical Sciences, so original, so absent-minded, so venerable in his blonde peruke and his costume of the fashion of 1850. Then there was Mme. De Lartigues, an old school friend of the Marquise, a brilliant and coquettish Parisienne. And there was Miss Hawthorne, an English maiden lady with youthful propensities. And there were many others, all of whom found plenty of amusement to their heart's content at Kerdall.

Outside of the ordinary pleasures of life there were some unusual attractions. In the first place the host and hostess had seen and experienced so much that was novel and startling that their conversation was always fascinating. Then the rooms of the castle constituted a veritable museum, being stocked with rare and curious objects from two continents. And, finally, a menagerie had been created in one corner of the park and stocked with various animals, which M. De Kerdall had picked up during the voyage and brought back to France for purposes of acclimatization. There were gazelles, antelopes, Thibet goats, Nile ibises, rose flamingoes, opossums, beavers and an Asiatic ape of the mandrill species, as mild as a lamb, but as mischievous as all his kind. An iron lattice cage had been built for him close to the conservatory.

As will be seen, the chateau de Kerdall was a veritable Eden, but this fact did not prevent little Mme. De Lartigues from dreading the isolated position of the place among the wide expanse of woods and fields.

"I should be afraid to live here all the year round," she said.

"Afraid of what, my dear?" asked the Marquise.

"Oh, of robbers; they would fairly revel here."

Robbers! In this mansion filled to the eaves with guests and servants! Everybody mocked at the young woman and old Dr. Cornabuc told horrible stories till Mme. De Lartigues, ashamed of her chimerical fears, was the first to laugh, and when the retiring hour came she mounted to her sleeping apartment on the second floor supplied with a goodly stock of heroism. Within a short time all the occupants of the chateau were in the land of dreams.

How long Mme. De Lartigues slept she knew not. She was awakened by a rattling at her window, which she had left half opened on account of the heat.

What was her terror when, in the feeble starlight, she saw a form climbing noiselessly through the window. She tried to scream, but her throat was parched with fright and she could not utter a sound.

The man had entered the chamber. Then the poor woman hastily buried her head beneath the bed clothing. Half dead with fear, she could hear her nocturnal visitor going and coming across the carpet with muffled steps. It seemed as though he must have removed his shoes in order to tread softly.

Bathed with cold perspiration and her teeth chattering, she awaited the mortal blow from the invader. But it did not come.

After about a quarter of an hour she timidly peered out. She could see and hear nothing. Slightly reassured, she recovered the use of her voice and started a series of shrieks, so sharp, piercing and terrible that in an instant the entire chateau was turned into her chamber with lights in their hands, M. and Mme. De Kerdall at the head.

"What is it? What's the matter?" they cried.

She recounted her horrible vision. They would not believe her; she had been dreaming. Who could have climbed into this chamber, so high above the ground, without a ladder?

"Did you see him plainly?" asked the Marquis, with a touch of suspicion in his voice.

"As plainly as I see you, and it even seemed——" She hesitated.

"What?"

"It seemed as though I could recognize Dr. Cornabuc in his blonde wig and redingote."

Everybody laughed. What! Dr. Cornabuc! A man of age and character scaling windows at midnight! It was certain now that Mme. Lartigues had been dreaming. They tried to dissipate her fear, and she was just about to persuade herself that she had been the victim of an hallucination when she happened to cast her eyes upon the bureau, where she had left her jewels.

They were gone! It had truly been a robber!

The laughing suddenly ceased, and they looked at one another in consternation.

All at once another cry was heard, a piercing shriek coming through the stillness of the night. It appeared to emanate from Miss Hawthorne's chamber. There was a rush for her apartment, and the English lady was found standing in the middle of the room, with frightened eyes.

"There! there!" she cried, pointing to the window. "A man! He has escaped, but I recognized him."

"Who was it?"

"Dr. Cornabuc!"

The doctor again! This time nobody laughed. Cornabuc was looked for among the persons who had been attracted by the excitement, but he was not there. He was the only occupant of the chateau who was missing.

"Come, let us go to the doctor's room," said the Marquis, knitting his brows. "He will doubtless solve the mystery for us."

All followed Kerdall—the men half dressed, the women in their white night robes, all carrying candles—a weird procession.

Upon the entrance of the crowd the doctor hurriedly wrapped himself in the bedclothes, his wrinkled countenance alone being visible over the top, and this convulsed by anger into a comical grimace. The candle light was reflected from his bald pate, which shone like ivory.

"Is this some ill-timed joke?" he stormed. "What is going on? Is the chateau on fire? I heard a terrible outcry, and was about to inquire into it."

"You must come and join us, doctor," said Kerdall.

"And how shall I do it?" cried the Doctor, furiously. "Some rascal has run off with my clothing, and in exchange he has left me this," and he savagely hurled a white object into the middle of the room.

"My corsets!" murmured Miss Hawthorne, modestly lowering her eyes.

"And this?" continued the Doctor, wildly brandishing another article.

"My hat!" cried Mme. de Lartigues.

"This raillery passes all bounds," howled the Doctor, whose shining head, with one final grimace, ducked beneath the bed clothing, like the clown going through a trap door in the marionette theater.

They knew not what to think. The mystery was growing more complicated. It certainly looked as though a robber had entered the chateau—perhaps a whole band of burglars and assassins. Mme. De Lartigues imagined a troop of brigands armed to the teeth.

"Let us hope they have no guns," said the Marquis, to raise the hopes of his guests.

There was no echo to the pleasantry.

Suddenly a strange sound was heard coming from the ground floor. It was certainly the piano in the reception salon, but it was surely being played by goblin fingers, and so furiously that it seemed as though the keys must be broken.

"This is too much!" cried the Marquis, rushing toward the staircase, with all the crowd, excepting Dr. Cornabuc, close behind him.

They hastily penetrated the salon. It was empty. The mysterious visitor was gone, but he could not be far away. The crash of china and glass announced his presence in the dining-room.

Everybody rushed thither, and the Marquis, who was in the lead, dimly saw a form escaping through the window into the garden.

"This time we've got him!" he cried.

The men seized guns and knives from a hunting rack in the vestibule and started across the garden and park in pursuit of the fugitive, while the women barricaded themselves in the salon and anxiously awaited the result of the chase.

It was about an hour later, in the uncertain light which precedes the rising of the sun, that a servant discovered the mysterious stranger ensconced among the branches of a large oak. At his call the Marquis and his guests hastened to the spot.

"Come down!" commanded M. De Kerdall, but the bandit only settled himself deeper among the foliage and made no response.

"Come down, or I will shoot!"

And, as there was no reply, he lifted his gun and already had his finger upon the trigger when the domestic hurriedly pulled his arm, and said:

"Do not fire, monsieur. It is Dr. Cornabuc!"

And, sure enough, the blonde wig and long redingote could now be seen among the leaves.

But at this moment the first ray of sunlight gleamed in from the east and the oak was illuminated. The Marquis suddenly broke into a fit of explosive laughter, and, as his guests gazed up into the tree, they could not keep from following his example.

"The ape!"

Everything was explained. The animal had escaped from his cage the previous evening and had managed to effect an entrance into the chateau. Animated by his instinct of imitation, he had first attired himself in the doctor's effects and then wandered over the house at his own free will.

He was put back into his prison after some little trouble, and at daybreak the party enjoyed a hearty laugh at the adventures of the night.

But Dr. Cornabuc did not appear at the table. He left the chateau at an early hour, furious and without taking leave.

Since this episode he has never set foot at Kerdall, and he has never lost a feeling of deep antipathy to Mme. De Lartigues and Miss Hawthorne.

"How could they have mixed me up with a monkey?" he wants to know.—Argonaut.

SURGERY IN THE BACKWOODS.

Dislocation Treated by Means of a Pulley and Steam Engine.

"Probably as queer a piece of backwoods surgery as has been described," says a frequenter of the region, "was that performed by a Moosehead lake guide known as "Old Sabattus," twenty years ago. The man was not an Indian, as the nickname implies, but a Yankee, one of those rough fellows formerly characteristic of that locality. This guide was left on a lake steamboat at one of the far up landings while the engineer went ashore with the company. A man named Meservey came aboard and in fooling around the boat managed to tumble down into the fire pit and put his shoulder out of joint.

"Here was a dilemma. The other members of the party would not be back for half an hour, and the injured man was in great pain. The guide was a man of expedients. He got a rope and tied his patient securely to a post. Then he tied another rope around the man's wrist and hitched the loose end of it to a pulley of the engine. He managed somehow to turn on steam and the pulley began to wind up the rope. It drew the arm out tight in beautiful shape and presently the joint snapped back into its socket. Then 'Sabattus' jumped around to shut off steam while the pulley kept on winding. 'Holy Moses,' gasped the guide, excitedly, 'how does it go? I don't know where 'tis. I can't stop the blanked thing,' and the pulley meanwhile was slowly but surely pulling Meservey to pieces. His eyes were sticking out of their sockets and he screamed and gasped for breath.

"'Sabattus' danced around like a wild man, not knowing what to do, when he happened to spy a hatchet lying near and, jumping for that, he cut the rope and saved a dreadful catastrophe. This was done just as the party of city folks who had gone ashore came rushing back on to the boat, alarmed by Meservey's screams. It was some years afterward," says the narrator, "that I was present when a lot of summer company arrived at Greenville. 'Sabattus' was there, too, and presently a distinguished looking man, one of the newcomers, went up to him and said with a meaning smile: 'Are you not the man that practices surgery by steam?' and 'Sabattus' had to admit that he was 'that same feller.'"—Lewiston, Me., Journal.

Dangerous Sheep.

The dangers of mountain climbing are in general pretty well understood, and so can be guarded against, but Sir W. Martin Conway, in Scribner's Magazine, narrates a mountain adventure of a really novel sort.

On the way to Mud Lake we had a strange adventure, of which I was fortunate enough to secure a photograph. We were approaching the highest sheep pasture as the day waned. The sheep, seventeen hundred in number, saw us from the surrounding slopes, and urged by a longing for salt, rushed down upon us from all sides, with one united "Baa!" in a wild, converging avalanche.

We beat off the leaders, but they could not retreat, for those behind pressed them forward. Finding that Carrel was the salter morsel, the whole flock surged upon him. They lifted him off his feet, carried him forward, cast him to the ground and poured over him.

Fortunately the ground was flat. When the shepherd saw what had happened he whistled shrilly thrice, whereupon the sheep dispersed in terror, fleeing up the mountainside in all directions till no two remained together.

Oysters Becoming Rare.

"Oysters will be a very rare delicacy in a few years," said C. C. Hunt, an oyster man of New York. "For many years the beds were preserved to a large extent by having an oyster season and keeping alive the popular idea that oysters were not good except from September to April. This gave four months during which the oysters were let alone and allowed to increase. As a matter of fact, I think they are a little better during those four months than at any other time. This was first discovered by the seaside hotel men, and oysters were served during the summer months. The guests demanded bivalves when they returned to their homes, and now in all Eastern cities the signs of 'Fresh Oysters' are as numerous in July and August as in January and February. The new demand is being supplied, and at no time are the beds left undisturbed. It is now only a question of a few years before the oysters are gone, and all because the summer resort hotel men disabused the minds of the people as to their not being good to eat from April to September."

Thrifty Old Age.

Besides doing the butter making, cooking, washing, and housework of her family, an 80-year-old woman of Whitneyville, Me., walks a mile or two daily to pick blueberries, for which she gets about eight cents a quart.

Odd Place for a Piano Factory.

There was a piano factory at Wartburg, Tenn., before the war. The singular thing about it is that Wartburg was about one hundred miles from the nearest railroad and in the heart of the Cumberland mountains. The wood of which the instruments were made had to be brought from New York and then hauled 100 miles over the mountains to Wartburg, which was a German colony. The pianos were made by a practical musician, and when an instrument was ordered he would finish up the different parts at Wartburg and then haul them to the home of his customer, generally many miles away, and put up the piano there. One of them is now at Wartburg, and the building where they were made still stands, although no longer used as a piano manufactory. The town, which consists of about two hundred people, is away from the railroad and has not grown since the war. The home-made instrument, of over thirty years ago, is still in good order and in constant use.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

In Person.

The late Isaac F. Redfield, who was Chief Justice of Vermont, was a tall and dignified man, whom his juniors, in irreverent fashion, used, "unbeknownst," to call by his first name. One of these younger men, Wm. Herrick, was in the judge's office, and another youth, a friend of his, one day told him he wished to consult a certain book, which proved to be difficult of access.

"It's in Isaac's library," said Herrick. "He isn't at home, so you can go in and find it for yourself."

The young man did as he was bidden. He came at once on the book, sat down and began to read it. Presently a tall and serious looking gentleman opened the door and came in. The reader glanced up from his page and greeted him affably.

"Want to see Isaac, sir?" he asked.

"Young man," said the stranger, solemnly and portentiously, "I am Isaac!"

The Care of Teeth.

The care of children's teeth should begin as soon as there are any to care for. Buy for them a soft brush, a hard one would not only be disagreeable to them, but injure the enamel and cause the gums to recede. Teach them its use morning and evening at least, with once or twice a week perhaps a good powder,—plain precipitated chalk is always safe. Teach them to brush the teeth up and down, not across. A thin quill toothpick or piece of floss silk should be passed between them after each meal, but this is an operation to be carried on in private. Have a reliable dentist to examine them once or twice a year. If he is your family dentist he will not charge for this unless he finds something that needs to be done, and it may save future pain and disfigurement. It is a great unkindliness to a child to allow its teeth to be neglected.

A Moorish Legend.

A certain Sultan one morning commanded his Prime Minister to take a census of all the stupid people in his Empire, and let him have the correct list. The Vizier set to work and at the head of the list, which was a very long one, he placed the name of his sovereign. The latter happened to be in a good humor and merely inquired how he came to merit the distinction.

"Sire," the Minister replied, "I have entered you on the list because only two days ago you entrusted large sums of money, for the alleged purpose of buying horses abroad, to a couple of men who are entire strangers, and who will never come back again.

"Is that your opinion? But suppose they do?"

"Then I will erase your name and place theirs at the head of the list."—La Monde Pittoresque.

Unknown Man Killed

Run Down by the B. & O. East Bound Local This Morning.

Word reached here this morning that an unknown man had been run over by the east bound B. & O. local about one mile on thisside of Garrett. His head was severed from his body and he was horribly mangled other wise. No one identified the remains. It is not known how he met the terrible death, but it is supposed that he was stealing a ride.

Since the above was put in type we learn the man was only last night released from the calaboose at Garrett. He was held there on a charge of an attempt to murder over in Ohio, but was released last night as no one wanted him, and he had served 48 hours in the lock up.

Is That So?

The Dispatch says, "In Auburn, the successful business men are in line with the same class in Chicago, New York and elsewhere and will vote nearly solidly with their class for honest money regardless of former party affiliations." We presume by this is meant that all successful business men in Auburn will vote for McKinley. We happen to know several very successful business men here who will do no such a thing. It is a fling at a half of the business men in Auburn, which the Dispatch will not care to recall after the campaign is over. There are plenty of business men everywhere who are tired of these hard times, and are going to try a change. It cannot be worse.

Slangy.

Dolliver! "What a name, to fill the speaking trump of future fame." But if the poet had heard Bre'r. Dolliver, yesterday he would have added that Dolliver was slangy. He had a good audience at the opera House, and consumed about the usual time on the 50 cent dollar fake. The fact is he probably believes this ghost story. Other and more intelligent people, do not any longer. Then he pointed out how rich the McKinley tariff had made the workingman. Wages he said had never been as high or work so steady. There were no strikes or lockouts, he said. But everybody knows that the McKinley bill was enacted in 1890 and repealed in '93, and that it covered a period of more than usual labor troubles and strikes. The great strike and lockout at Homestead was in '92, when the locked out workmen had pitched battles with the Pinkerton men, and many of them were killed. He called free silver a "skin game" and said any one who believed in it was silly enough to be fleeced by fakirs at at the same game day after day. He said silver men had wheels in their head that run like a velocipede. He talked of a "skin game from Colorado," and said he knew silver men who had not given their mouths a rest in six weeks. He was a ready speaker, but a very poor scholar, as his bad pronunciation showed. A man can do no good who deals in slang and hard names rather than argument. This is the man who has been billed at different places as Congressman Dolliver of Iowa. He is merely the Congressman's brother.

A GREAT BATTLE IS ON

ORGANIZED LABOR IS FOR THE ELECTION OF BRYAN.

Results of Numerous Test Votes in Chicago and Elsewhere—The Pri ters of the Chicago Gold Bug Papers for Bryan and Free Silver.

In Omaha 25 per cent of the republican vote is enrolled in Bryan free silver clubs, while in the country the proportion is larger. These facts are sufficient to justify the national democratic managers in the belief that the November election will result in a free silver landslide.

In the little town of Canton, Ills., there is a silver republican club of 318 members.

Hon. Emil Hoechester, of Chicago, has been making speeches to Germans all over Illinois, and reports that with a few exceptions in the large towns the German-American vote of the state is almost solid for Bryan, Altgeld and free silver. In St. Clair county, where a large proportion of the population is composed of substantial German farmers, the free silver sentiment is overwhelming, many former republican Germans ardently supporting Mr. Bryan.

In order to further their plans of coercion, intimidation and persecution of facts, the big corporations have been taking alleged ballots of their workmen. In each instance these ballots were notoriously unfair, the workmen being obliged to cast their ballots in boxes designated "McKinley," "Bryan" or "Palmer," and in plain view of foremen or other subordinate officials of the corporations, the result being that very few men dared to express their real sentiments. At the Crane Manufacturing company of this city the men were forced to cast ballots of red and white, the red ballots being for McKinley and the white for Bryan, and these they were compelled to cast in full view of the officials of the company. The result, of course, was an overwhelming majority for McKinley, when, as a matter of fact, three-fourths of the men will vote for Bryan.

At the Illinois Steel works in South Chicago three ballot boxes were used for voting purposes, labelled, respectively, "McKinley," "Bryan" and "Palmer." The men being afraid to cast ballots in the Bryan boxes naturally deposited them in the boxes labelled "McKinley." The result of the balloting, however, was astonishing. Out of 2,700 votes cast, 2,200 of them were for Bryan, and the remaining 500 were for McKinley or Palmer. The Bryan ballots being deposited in the McKinley box, the officials were unable to spot the men. It is unnecessary to say that this vote was never given to the public. It is known, however, to be absolutely true.

The five big morning papers of Chicago are engaged in an attempt to show that organized labor is opposed to Bryan and free silver. It may be interesting to the goldbug publishers of those newspapers to show that of 361 men employed in their composing and press rooms, 317 will vote for Bryan, while but 44 will vote for McKinley. These men belong to the finest labor organization in the world, and cannot be bulldozed or coerced into stifling their convictions. A ballot was taken yesterday in the mechanical departments of the newspapers alluded to with the following result:

	Bryan.	McKinley.
Tribune	63	12
Record	62	5
Chronicle	60	10
Inter Ocean	57	13
Times-Herald	55	4
Total	317	44

The vote for governor of Illinois stood as follows:

	Altgeld.	Tanner.
Tribune	71	4
Record	86	1
Chronicle	67	3
Inter Ocean	61	8

It will be seen from the above ballots that the estimate made by labor leaders in Chicago that nine-tenths of the organized labor vote of Chicago will be cast for Bryan and free silver, is a correct one.

A Wisconsin banker and cattleman, a strong advocate of the gold standard, writes from Fargo, S. D., where he has been for several weeks looking after his interests—that he has been converted to the cause of "sound money," gold and silver at 16 to 1. He says: "I have learned more of the true condition and the needs of the producing classes—the farmer, cattlemen and laborers of the west, on this trip than I ever knew before, and am at liberty to confess that I have been compelled to make a complete change in front on the financial question. You may count upon me to do what I can henceforward to secure the election of Mr. Bryan as well as the silver congressman in my district."

In one of Armour & Co.'s shops at the stock yards a similar vote resulted: 675 for Bryan and 125 for McKinley. This vote was also suppressed. Wherever the men have had a fair chance to express their views the result has been an overwhelming majority for Bryan.

Hon. Thomas N. Patterson, of Colorado, will speak in Michigan from October 7 to 13, inclusive; in Illinois from October 15 to 21, inclusive; in Iowa from October 23 to 27, inclusive; in Kansas from October 29 to 31, inclusive.

Hon. Leon Bailey, of Indianapolis, was at national headquarters to-day. Mr. Bailey says that if the election were held to-day, Indiana would give Bryan 25,000 majority. Free silver sentiment is, however, increasing so rapidly in the agricultural districts that he feels absolutely certain that the state will give even a much larger majority. Mr. Bailey said: "If there is any one state of the Union that is sure to go for Bryan Indiana is that one. I know what I am talking about; a canvass of the state by counties assured me of this fact."

The workingmen of Mark Hanna's own neighborhood in Cleveland, O., have repudiated him. The employes in the shops of the Walker Manufacturing company of Cleveland, located within a mile of Mark Hanna's residence, have in a secret and perfectly fair ballot declared in favor of Bryan by an overwhelming majority. The company employs over 300 men in both departments, and nearly all are voters. In a total vote of 326 Bryan gets 273 votes and McKinley 33. The ballot was fair and a secret one.

Reports from Ohio also indicate a regular stampede of republican farmers to Bryan. A canvass of Tuscawaras county shows that in ten townships the republicans who intend to vote for Bryan are as follows: No. 1, 171; No. 2, 74; No. 3, 18; No. 4, 18; No. 5, 37; No. 6, 56; No. 7, 74; No. 8, 117; No. 9, 176; No. 10, 44, making a total of 685 voters who are leaving the republican party, or a net gain of 672 in that county, as the canvass showed that there were only thirteen anti-silver democrats. Similar reports come from Knox, Coshocton and Wayne counties.

Hon. W. S. McComas arrived Thursday from making a series of speeches in Maryland. He reports that Maryland is aflame with free silver sentiment. In a conversation had with Senator Gorman just before coming to Chicago Mr. McComas says that Mr. Gorman informed him that Bryan would carry every county in Maryland, and that the only fight at all is in Baltimore, and that Baltimore will go for Bryan by a safe majority.

Fusion between the democrats and populists has been completed in Indiana, the democrats having ten electors and the populists five electors on the national ticket. This fusion is perfectly satisfactory to all parties, and assures Indiana to Bryan by a majority of not less than 25,000.

The demand at national democratic headquarters for free silver literature is on the increase, and has reached proportions during the present week which tax every effort of the literary bureau to meet. These requests come from every state in the union and are almost invariably accompanied by statements that the free silver sentiment is growing and gaining strength every day. They show that the feeling for Bryan instead of being on the wane, as asserted by goldbug organs, is assuming the proportions of a national political revolution. There is an overwhelming demand this week for German literature, the reports showing a remarkable change of sentiment among German voters toward Bryan and free silver.

There are about 275 reporters and editorial writers employed on the Chicago papers. A careful canvass shows that 255 of them will vote for William Bryan. Of the 61 writers on the staff of the Chicago Times-Herald 56 are for free silver and are earnest personal workers for Bryan and Sewall.

"If my father could vote today he would vote for Bryan for President of the United States."

The above words are from the lips of Jesse Grant, favorite son of Gen. U. S. Grant. The son has left the Republican party just as his father before him left the Democratic party when it made a compromise with the slave power. In his farewell to the Republican party Jesse Grant writes:

"I believe honestly in the great advantage to this country of the free coinage of silver. It does not mean repudiation of our debts at home or abroad. These debts will have to be paid in products, and anything that will raise the value of them will, I believe, benefit all classes. "If we can double the price of a silver rupee we have doubled the price of the wheat that comes into competition with our wheat, and therefore double our wheat as to its debt paying capacity. The same argument holds good of the silver peso of the Latin-American countries and the price of our meats and live stock. It holds good, too, in the silver ruble and the price of oil. It holds good in many ways too numerous to mention.

"Instead of foreigners purchasing the product of our silver mines at the rate of 70 cents per ounce, and with this silver buying produce, some of which comes in direct competition with our productions, from South America and the orient, they would have to pay at the rate of $1.29 per ounce.

"As to repudiation, why, we have practically repudiated already, if bankruptcy means failure to pay debts. Did you ever think of what an awful debt America owes today? Nineteen thousand millions of mortgaged indebtedness. All the gold and silver in the world would not pay one-third of this single item of mortgage indebtedness, and under our present arrangement of things the awful disparagement between the ability to produce and the power of money to accumulate interest makes the breach between this country and solvency grow wider every year. Prices go down, money going up. Interest eating, eating all the time. How can it ever be paid? The free coinage of silver I do not believe to be a panacea for all our evils, but I do believe it a step in the right direction and for the best interest of the American people."

Signed, JESSE GRANT

P. S.—Of course Mark Hanna and his multi-millionaire campaign committee are calling Jesse Grant an anarchist, a repudiator, a thief and a scoundrel. Let the people vote Hanna and his crowd out of existence November 3d. If they don't they will never get another chance.

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

McKINLEY

Get out, old Pap McKinley
With your tariff racket rot,
We've paid enough of taxes
For to make the boodlers fat.
You cannot fool the workman
So that he will vote a tax,
Upon his food and clothing
Just to grind some feller's ax.
That dishonest, honest-dollar
That you prate so much about
Is the most dishonest dollar
That has ever started out.
It fattens in the coffers
Of the lazy millionaire
Their claims of labor's products
Yea, the greedy lion's share.
Just wait till old November
Rolls around election day,
And quiet sober people
With their ballots have their say.
You'll find you've been barkin'
Up a very different tree,
From that where William Bryan
Caught a coon November 3.

Pluck Industry.

Decatur Democrat News,

Our townswoman, Mrs. M. J. Dixon, or "Grandma" Dixon, as she is more familiarly called—deserves more than a passing notice. She is now 76 years old, and has always been noted for her industry. Since the death of her husband, which occurred four years ago, she has kept an account of a part of her work that she has done. She has made 963 bonnets, at an average price of 25 cents each. Her bonnets have have gone to seven different states. Sixty-one have been sent to Michigan, and she was awarded first premium on one at the Muskegon county fair this year. She has sent sixteen to Kansas, three to Nebraska, twenty-seven to Mississippi, two to Pennsylvania, thirty-one to Indiana, and three to Wisconsin, while our own town and adjoining ones are kept bonnetted by the work of her hands. Nor is this all. During this time she has quilted 45 quilts, pieced 27 of them, knotted 13 comforters, done 208 washings, and run on many errands of mercy that only the Recording Angel of Heaven has a record of. She has been the faithful wife of three husbands. The last one an invalid for many years before his death, and her constant care was to keep him comfortable. Her life has been a busy one, full of toil and care. She has a cozy home on Smith street, free from dept, secured by her earnings. She is the best cook in town. She has done much for the church and for charity, and many will have reason to call her blessed in the judgment day. Many other good words might be said of her. We should uncover our heads in the presence of so venerable a mother. That she may be spared to us for many years, is the prayer of her numerous friends.

A Chance to Make Money.

I read how one of your subscribers make money selling Dishwashers; I ordered one, and my lady friends were charmed, as they hate dish washing. My brother and I commenced selling them, and have made $1,700 after paying all expenses. We don't canvass any. Our sales are all made at home. People come or send for them. The Mound City Dish Washer is the best Dishwasher on the market. Our business is increasing, and we are going to keep right on, until we make ten thousand dollars. We sell from 5 to 15 machines every day. The Dishwasher is lovely, every housekeeper wants one There is no excuse to be poor when so much money can be made selling Dishwashers. For full particulars, address The Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. They will start you on the road to success.—A reader. 2

Horrible! Horrible!

Innocent children by the thousand are constantly dying of diarrhœa whose life might be saved. How quickly the demon works! Flesh speedily wastes away as though subjected to fire. You try change of water, and change of food and change of air. The handiest and quickest and safest thing you can do is to procure at once a bottle of Dr. Hand's Diarrhœa Mixture, at any drug store, for 25c. It's wonderful how quickly it brings good results. ST. VITUS DANCE.

A Physician Prescribes Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.:
My daughter Mattie, aged 14, was afflicted last spring with St. Vitus dance and nervousness, her entire right side was numb and nearly paralyzed. We consulted a physician and he prescribed Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine. She took three bottles before we saw any certain signs of improvement, but after that she began to improve very fast and I now think she is entirely cured. She has taken nine bottles of the Nervine, but no other medicine of any kind.

SAD SUICIDE OF RICHARD SHOBER

Mental Derangement From Overwork Causes His Death

CHICAGO, Oct. 9.—Crazed by overstudy and ill health, Richard Shober, 12 Belden place, committed suicide yesterday morning in Lincoln Park by shooting himself. Shober recently returned from Europe, where he had been studying art, and it is believed that he became mentally deranged by overwork. The following letter was in his pocket:

In this trying time I cannot think; my nerves are shattered from sleeplessness; insanity stares me in the face. O God, O my parents, forgive this deed.

This was all that was found about the body which gave any explanation for his act.

ARKADELPHIA, ARK., Oct. 8.—H. C. McCarroll, a prominent business man, well known throughout Arkansas, who served during the war with distinction as a member of General Heinman's Brigade, and who suffered intensely from nervous prostration caused from overwork and heart trouble has been completely restored to health by Dr. Miles, Restorative Nervine and New Heart Cure.

JONESVILLE, MICH., Oct. 9.—Dr. C. E. Speer, prominent here as an expert dentist, who broke down completely two years ago from extreme nervousness, caused by overwork and sleeplessness, used Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine some months since. It restored him to health and he has had no return of the trouble.

Old Politics

We were pleased, on last Sunday to meet Hon. John B. Glover of Indianapolis, with whom we had a brief acquaintance many years ago. He was treasurer of state for a term or two having been elected in the Greeley campaign of 1872 by a small majority. Our older voters will recall, that at campaign, the state vote was so nearly even that a part of each ticket was elected. The democrats got the governor. Thomas A. Hendricks, by about 900, and the superintendent of public instruction Milton B. Hopkin by a smaller majority, The republicans got the rest including the lieutenant-governor. Mr. Wildman for auditor beat John B. Stoll by about 300 only. Such a thing does not often happen. Mr. Glover is still a strong republican and we suppose he was here in the interest of that party.

Political Notes.

Straws are still popular. A traveling man drove over from Butler the other day and counted the presidential pictures in the houses along the route When he had counted up to 17, it stood 16 to 1 for Bryan. By the time Auburn was reached it stood, Bryan 22; McKinley 6.

Republicans are like a telephone conversation to a bystander—hear only one side.

Last week, when the governor was speaking, it is said that Sheriff Stroh was driving about town with a man he had put a gold hat onto and claimed to have turned from a democrat to McKinley and gold. It is said they introduced him over town. We have since heard he was an unknown tramp with a well developed jag. Stroh's populist friends should have seen that gold hat. Even if the conversion was real, it shows what a curiosity a convert is in the McKinley camp.

R. M. Lockhart is going about claiming that E. R. Shoemaker did not give in all his property to the assessor. And the democrats now claim that Mr. Yarde, Shoemaker's opponent has not given in all of his. So it is a stand off. Great campaign, this.

Thomas Garfield, brother of James A. also the latters son, Gen. Grants son, a son of Senator Plumb of Kansas lieutenant governor of Minnesota have all left the republicans and come over to free silver.

We are told that at a recent republican rally at the Junction their glee club sang something that contained smart allusions to the editor of this paper. We are sorry to hear this for while we expect togo thundering down the ages in story and song, we dont want to be in anything quite as rocky as the campaign songs we heard the other night at their meeting in the Opera House. We allude to such ones as that beginning. "McKinley the gem of the ocean."

Judge Penfield and a traveling men had a little tilt at table at the Swineford the other day. The Judge suggested that the traveling man was the street fakir that had been holding forth on the street a few evenings. Hot words followed, and the Judge finally apologized for his imprudent remark. His opponent was a Bryan man.

ELECTRIC BITTERS.

Electric Bitters is a medicine suited for any person, but perhaps more generally needed in the Spring, when the languid exhausted feeling prevails, when the liver is torpid and sluggish and the need of a tonic and alterative is felt. A prompt use of this medicine has often averted long and perhaps fatal bilious fevers. No medicine will act more surely in counteracting and freeing the system from the malarial poison. Headache, Indigestion Constipation, Dizziness yield to Electric Bitters. Only fifty cents per bottle at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store.

None Equal to Dr Hand's So says Mrs

Nelsonville; O., Dec. 20, '95—Dr. Hand—Dear Sir:—"I have been using your remedies for my children for over four years. I have used many other medicines but have found none equal to your. Have recommended Dr. Hand's Colic Cure to many others mothers and persuaded them to try it; they all say it proves satisfactory. I am the mother of nine children and am never without a bottle of all of Dr. Hand's Remedies in the house." At Fischler & Son's 1

Need More

Fairbanks the millionaire who wants to be U. S. senator from Indiana said in a speech, that "Bryan wants a piece of silver that cost 53 cent coined and stamped as a dollar." But there is nothing new or dangerous in that. The dollar we are passing every day for 100 cents along both our greenback dollars and gold dollars is that very kind of a dollar. The trouble is its scarcity. All our dollars are good Give us more of them.

Continued Success.

As I have been suffering from an oblique inguinal hernia on the right side and hearing of so many cures Dr. Casebeer was making on my neighbors I resolved to secure treatment, and I therefore placed my case in his hands and after six treatments find myself perfectly cured. I am a farmer sixty-five years old, and have worn no truss for two months, and have been doing my usual work, and feel justified in believing the cure perfect, and take pleasure in recommending the Fidelity cure as given by Dr. Casebeer to everyone needing the cure.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. Marvelous Results.

From a letter written by Rev. J. Gunderman, of Dimondale, Mich., we are permitted to make this extract: "I have no hesitation in recommending Dr King's New Discovery as the results were almost marvelous in the case of my wife While I was pastor of the Baptist church Rices Junction she was brought down with pneumonia succeeding lagrippe. Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little interruption and it seemed as if she could not survive them. A friend recommended Dr. King's New Discovery; it was quick in working and highly satisfactory in results." Trial bottles free at Robbins & McCord's drug store Regular size 50c and $1:00.

Mrs Bellfor, 222 Crane St, Writes:

Dayton, O., March 12, '96.—"My baby two months old and from her birth has had severe attacks of wind colic. I tried almost everything, but nothing gave her any relief until I got Dr. Hand's Colic Cure. I have used two bottles I would not do without it. It surely the best colic medicine ever made." Ayer's Hair Vigor Makes Hair Grow

Gov. Matthews.

Thursday's Daily.

It has been a great day for Auburn, for it is not often we have the governor with us. All the forenoon the people kept coming in, and at noon there were several large delegations and drum corps in town. The largest were from Concord and Richland. Then came the Angola delegation, with the white uniforms of the drum corps, and with them their ladies' drum corps with their neat uniforms. All these, and our own band met the governor as the train came in. There were also the body of 16 white horses and one for gold, and 16 old men with one for gold. It was a very attractive feature. All these bodies escorted the governor up to the Glazier Hotel, where a crowd of eager friends pressed around him to show their regard. At two o'clock the speech began, at the band stand. The crowd by this time was very large. He was introduced by Hon. S. S. Shutt in a few happy remarks, and proceeded to deliver a masterly speech. His hearers were silver men of all parties, and not only gave him the most earnest attention, but generous and enthusiastic cheer.

Two Meetings.

Friday's Daily.

The two democratic meetings yesterday, here and at Garrett, were largely attended, the one at Garrett, being probably much the largest, as the farmers, are pretty busy now with their corn, and can't turn out in the day. This, when we remember the great crowd here, will give one an idea of the attendance at Garrett. But at Garrett there was but little formality of meeting delegations, The Governor went over from here, together with a score or two of Auburn people. When he reached there the street was full of people in front of Wagner's Opera House, ready to receive him. At the residence of Chairman Fredericks, there was an informal reception for him, lasting nearly an hour, and many of the leading people met him. Everybody is pleasantly impressed with his ways. At the Opera House, not half the crowd could get in, but those in the street paraded about town with two bands and a drum corps and cheered till they were tired out. which was preety late. The governor spoke about three quarters of an hour, but was too hoarse to continue, and Mr. Bell finished out the time. They both made effective speeches and were liberally cheered all through. The audience staid till the last word was said. Gov. Matthews and Mr. Bell, both returned to Auburn, and this morning, Dr. Nusbaum, Auditor Borst and Mr. Thumma took him over to Albion where the Governor speaks this afternoon. He is highly gratified by the reception DeKalb county gave him, and spoke in complimentary terms of all the arrangements. And he never fails to give Co. K. a kind word, and express his high regard for the character of its officers and men. He was especially pleased to meet them at the train as members of both parties, yet eager to honor him as the state's chief magistrate and their commander-in-chief. Somehow a number of our governors have made themselves popular with the common people, and Governor Matthews is of this number. After January 11 next, he retires from office to private life, and says he will move back onto his farm in Vermillion county and go to raising ten cent oats for a living, unless as he sincerely believes, the election of Bryan will make better times and secure better prices.

Marry This Girl Somebody!

I have been reading in your paper about several men and women, that have been very successful selling self-heating flat-irons, and I concluded I would see what a girl could do. I have worked 12 days and have sold 151 irons and have $218 left after paying all expenses. Everybody is delighted with it, as people think they can't afford to be without one as they save fuel and time and don't burn the clothes. I know I can clear five thousand dollars in a year. How is that for a girl? A GRADUATE.

Splendid, my girl, splendid, you are a true American girl Someone can get complete information about the self-heating iron by addressing J F. CASEY & CO., ST. LOTIS MO. It seems to be a winner, as everybody selling it writes in its praise. 3

The Dish Washer does splendid work; you can wash and dry your dishes in two or three minutes without putting your hands in the water at all. Try this business and let us know how you succeed. for Infants and Children.

MOTHERS, Do You Know that Paregoric, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, many so-called Soothing Syrups, and most remedies for children are composed of opium or morphine?

Do You Know that opium and morphine are stupefying narcotic poisons?

Do You Know that in most countries druggists are not permitted to sell narcotics without labeling them poisons?

Do You Know that you should not permit any medicine to be given your child unless you or your physician know of what it is composed?

Do You Know that Castoria is a purely vegetable preparation, and that a list of its ingredients is published with every bottle?

Do You Know that Castoria is the prescription of the famous Dr. Samuel Pitcher. That it has been in use for nearly thirty years, and that more Castoria is now sold than of all other remedies for children combined?

Do You Know that the Patent Office Department of the United States, and of other countries, have issued exclusive right to Dr. Pitcher and his assigns to use the word "Castoria" and its formula, and that to imitate them is a state prison offense?

Do You Know that one of the reasons for granting this government protection was because Castoria had been proven to be absolutely harmless?

Do You Know that 35 average doses of Castoria are furnished for 35 cents, or one cent a dose?

Do You Know that when possessed of this perfect preparation, your children may be kept well, and that you may have unbroken rest?

Well, these things are worth knowing. They are facts.

The fac-simile signature of Chas. H. Fletcher is on every wrapper.

CUBANS LAND ARMS.

Forts Were Less than One and One-Half Miles Away.

A dispatch to the New York Herald from Gibara, Cuba, says: The Herald's correspondent in Baracoa reports the landing of a new filibustering expedition in Mariri, in eastern Cuba. I understand that a party brought 1,000 rifles and a proportionate quantity of munitions. The men disembarked from a Haytian schooner between two Spanish forts, neither of which was a mile and a half away. The war material was all transported into the interior before any alarm was raised. Such is the state of suffering among the classes in Baracoa that the local Spanish commandant is now permitting women and children to go through the government lines to beg food in the rebel camps. More than 300 passes for this purpose are being issued daily. The women are subjected to rigid search as they go outside the walls of the town, to prevent any medicines being taken to the insurgents, and also upon their return for correspondence.

ACTIVE AT SEBASTOPOL.

Troops Are Mobilized Also at Odessa and Batoum.

The Daily London Graphic publishes a dispatch from Sebastopol saying that Russia is continuing her preparations for an emergency. The local military and naval forces at Sebastopol, Odessa, and Batoum have been mobilized. Gen. Bobrikoff, chief of the war office staff, recently arrived at Sebastopol, and has held important conferences with the local commanders. He has inspected the garrison and arsenal, and has picked out a company of submarine engineers, who have been ordered to hold themselves in readiness to immediately embark upon a gunboat. This gunboat is already loaded with mines, shells, and torpedoes. The interior garrisons in Poland, Taurida, and the Caucasus have received orders to be in readiness at a moment's notice to board special trains for ports on the Black Sea.

CUT FIFTY CENTS.

The Wabash Road Reduces Its Rate on Hard Coal.

The Wabash gives fresh evidence of its purpose to cast loose entirely from all further affiliation with the mangled remains of the Western Freight Association by cutting the rates on hard coal and saltpeter. The Wabash gives notice that it will carry hard coal from Toledo to the Missouri River for $2 a ton. The present rate is $2.50. The same company also announces that it will make a rate of 25 cents on saltpeter from Buffalo to Kansas City. The present rate is 32 cents. Immediately on receipt of this intelligence other roads in the Western Freight Association wired Chairman Midgeley for permission to meet the cut, but the chairman refused to authorize such a course, claiming that it would only tend to further demoralize the present unsatisfactory status of affairs.

BIG SHIP LOST.

She was a new vessel, built last year, and had five 6-inch quick-firing guns, six 4-inch guns, eight twelve-pounders and several guns of smaller caliber. The Talbot belonged to what is known as the eclipse class of protected cruisers, which includes the Diana, Dido, Doris, Isis, Juno, Minerva, Venus and Eclipse. Her registered speed was 19.5 knots and she carried 550 tons of coal.

THIRTEEN-YEAR-OLD MURDERER.

Kansas Woman Alleged to Have Incited Her Boy to Commit Crime.

Mrs. John Meyers and her 13-year-old son are in jail at Atchison, Kan., the latter being charged with murdering Lester Dyke, the 12-year-old son of a neighbor, and the former with being an accessory to the crime. The trouble arose over a kitten belonging to the Meyerses, and the most reliable version of the affair indicates the mother encouraged her son to commit the crime. The boys quarreled over the possession of the kitten, and Mrs. Meyers, it is said, incensed by seeing her hopeful get the worst of the scuffle, told him to get a knife and stab his adversary. He obeyed what is alleged to have been her command by stabbing young Dyke over the heart.

Two Outlaws Shot Dead.

The notorious Green gang of desperadoes of Indian Territory was given a hard blow Tuesday by United States Marshal Rutherford and his men. Bill and Edward Green were killed. Arthur Green, the youngest brother, was shot and captured, and Milton Barker was also taken into custody. On Sunday Marshal Rutherford learned that the Greens and their band had planned to rob the postoffice and railway station at Oologah and hold up the passenger train due there early in the morning. The officers planned to intercept the outlaws, and succeeded in getting the three Green brothers at a crossing on the Verdigris River, about five miles from Oologah. As the three bandits approached on horseback they were commanded to halt, but instead of doing so they wheeled their horses about and attempted to bring their rifles into play. The Marshal's posse replied with a volley. Bill and Ed Green fell from their horses, dead, and Arthur was so badly wounded that he was easily taken. Several recent killings and robberies are attributed to the Greens and their men.

Idea of Insurance Companies.

Twenty-five years ago Dr. Charles Denison, of Denver, in an article on consumption and the beneficial effects of Colorado air, advocated that insurance companies send their consumptive policy holders to sanitariums, where their lives, by careful treatment, could be prolonged for periods ranging from two to twenty years. He says several big companies are now figuring on the cost of locating large sanitariums in the Rocky mountain region, and going into the scientific business of prolonging life of consumptives in a wholesale manner.

Oil in Oklahoma.

A Ferry, O. T., special says: Great excitement exists in the eastern part of the county and in Pawnee County, in the Osage Indian nation, over the discovery of oil in great quantities. It has leaked out that the Standard Oil Company has secured options on thousands of acres, and twenty other companies have purchased leases consisting of many thousands of acres.

Train Robbers in Utah.

The Union Pacific fast mail due at Ogden, Utah, at 2 o'clock Wednesday morning was held up by masked and heavily armed men a half-mile east of Uintah. No passengers were molested, the robbers confining their operations to the mail and express cars. The robbers surprised the engineer by suddenly appearing from behind the tank and covering him with their guns. They ordered the fireman to cover his head with a cotton sack which they handed him. The engineer was ordered to stop the train and was told to indicate the express car, which he did. While the attention of the robbers was distracted the engineer ran away and escaped to Uintah, where he was followed by the express messenger, and Supt. O'Neil was notified. Meanwhile the baggage and express cars were uncoupled by the robbers and sent ahead of the train a few hundred yards, and both cars were broken open. The robbers failed to open the safe in the express car. The railway officials say all the booty secured was a few mail bags, the value of their contents being unknown.

HOLD UP A BANK AT MEEEKER, COLO.

Citizens of That Distant Town Receive the Desperadoes with Guns and Get them All.

News has just been received from Meeker, in the northwestern part of Colorado, of an attempted bank robbery that occurred Tuesday. Three men entered the bank, which is connected with the storeroom of J. W. Hugus & Co. Two of the men held the store employes at bay while the third went into the bank cashier's window, and, firing one shot, ordered the cashier to throw up his hands. The order was not quickly obeyed, and the robber fired again, whereupon the cashier's hands went up. The manager of the store was then forced to open the bank door, and after gathering up all the money in sight the robbers marched the cashier and store employes into the street with hands uplifted. They then rushed out the back way with their booty. Citizens, attracted by the shots, had pretty well surrounded the building by this time, and being armed, opened fire on the robbers, two of whom, Charles Jones and William Smith, were killed by the first volley. The third man, George Harris, was shot through the lungs, dying in two hours. He is fully identified. Four citizens were wounded, not seriously.

Ex-Senator Suddenly Expires at His Home in Grand Haven.

Ex-United States Senator Thomas W. Ferry died very suddenly at Grand Haven, Mich., Wednesday morning of paralysis. Senator Ferry had been in splendid health, excepting attacks of sudden dizziness, until three days before, when he took to his bed. Tuesday evening he was given a hypodermic injection. The family sat up with him a short time, when he seemed to be asleep. In the morning they found he was dead. Thomas White Ferry was born at Mackinac June 1, 1827. In 1853 he was elected to the Legislature; in 1864, elected to Congress, and in 1871, to the United States Senate. Italy Demands Price of Blood.

A dispatch from Rome says: The Italian government has addressed a peremptory note to the Porte in reference to a young Italian subject who was murdered in the recent massacres in Constantinople. The note says that the young man was felled to the ground and beaten on the head by a man in Turkish uniform, until he killed him. The note concludes by demanding the punishment of the guilty persons, and the payment of indemnity for the murder of an Italian subject.

HOW IT FEELS TO BE OPERATED UPON FOR APPENDICITIS.

WITHIN my recollection I always was an unfortunate individual, the only time that I was ever in real luck was in the city of Baltimore, Md., when I was operated on for appendicitis while that operation was practically unknown to the medical profession of the country. It is now commonly known by members of the medical profession and by laymen that appendicitis is a disease that often recurs several times before it assumes a dangerous form.

I suffered from my first atack of appendicitis, thought I was not then aware of the nature of the disease, nearly seven years ago. At that time I was visiting friends in Salina, Kan., and if I remember distinctly, we had spent the afternoon of the day before in consuming large quantities of forbidden fruit in the form of cherries belonging to a man who lived on the edge of the town.

These cherries were the apple of his eye, if you will allow me as great a license in my horticultural terms as I will probably take in the medical, and the only way we could secure them was by "shinning" the back fence while he and his watch dog were off duty. This naturally gave the fruit a finer flavor than it would have possessed otherwise, and the result was that we all ate more than was good for us.

On the day after, while everyone in the party was regretting the action of the day before—some that they had eaten so much of the fruit, and others that they had not saved some for the second day—I was struggling with one of the most peculiar sensations I ever experienced.

I had a sharp, shooting pain in a region which I can best describe in a general way by stating that it was in the lower right hand corner of my abdomen. The pain grew worse as the hours passed, and the people with whom I was stopping said they had best send for the family physician. I did not object, and in a short time the physician, a gray-haired and eminently respectable old gentleman, arrived.

He looked at me; felt my pulse, which is always rather strong, and took my temperature. Then he looked at me again, this time over the top of a pair of bow spectacles, and asked me what I had been eating.

I was not enjoying the situation a little bit, but I managed to gasp that I had been eating cherries, and the wise man said:

"Aha, I thought so."

I never knew exactly how he guessed it, but he said that I had a cramp in my stomach, and advised the application of hot cloths to the inflamed section. His advice was followed, and all that night my "tummie" was well poulticed to drive away the pain. Fortune was with me, and the scheme worked sucessfully.

I did not have a return of the trouble for nearly six months, and at this time it was slight. The same remedy was used, and I recovered.

When next I had an attack of the disease I was in Baltimore, and on this occasion the matter was as serious as it well could be without causing the issuance of a burial permit. The pain started as before, in the same place and of the same nature. I knew the symptoms by this time, and was aware of what I was in for.

The hot-cloth remedy was tried without avail, and the pain spread steadily until it covered the entire region of my abdomen. The pain grew more intense as the days passed, shooting up and down in my abdomen, and finally I was lying in bed with my right leg drawn up to my body, unable to move.

The physician who attended me was unable to solve the problem, and I was growing worse every minute. Finally he concluded that the best thing to do was to have a consultation, and he called in several physicians of more or less renown.

They looked me over critically, and decided that I was suffering from perityphlitis. I said that I supposed I was, although I did not know what they meant, though I have since discovered that this was the former name for appendicitis, which was then but vaguely hinted of at times.

I was told that I was as near death's door as one could possibly get and still live, and the physicians said that an operation was all that could save me, and then I stood only one chance in fifty. That settled it. I resolved to take that chance, and, in accordance with this determination, I was removed to a hospital on the following day.

On the day that the operation was to take place a number of the most prominent surgeons of the city were at the hospital to witness it, as they understood that the physicians who had me in charge were going to make an experiment extraordinary. Everything was arranged to a nicety, and when I was wheeled into the operating-room all was ready for my reception.

I was in an exhausted state at that time, but the physicians, after they placed me on the operating-table, explained how serious the situation was. They stated that it was a case of life or death, with the chances in favor of the latter.

I am not weak hearted but the manner in which this was said was enough to impress most anyone, and just as the little nurse was approaching with the ether I concluded that I would take just one more look around before I took a chance on passing into the great beyond.

I communicated this wish to the assembled surgeons, and they granted it most graciously. One elderly man with side whiskers raised me up on the table so that I could see out of the window, and supported me while I gazed out into the blue sky.

The scene is one that I will never forget. I did not look at anything in particular, but I can remember hearing the distinct hum of voices on the street below, the rattle of the cable in its conduit, and the chirping of the birds in the trees outside the building. The sun was shining brightly through the window, and the little nurse was bustling about the room, getting all things ready.

I was awakened from my reverie by the metallic clash of one knife against another, and turned my head sufficiently to see a sallow young student preparing the instruments, and at the same time puffing on a cigarette with all the nonchalance of a veteran operator.

This brought me to my senses and I lay back on the operating-table, telling the surgeons to go ahead. I had not given up all hope, by a large majority, and was determined to take the one chance in fifty which had been referred to.

The nurse advanced with the ether, and a bell-shaped mask, which reminded me of a piece of wire screen covered with cloth, was placed over my nose and mouth. Suddenly something cold and wet dropped upon this screen, and the spray covered my face, while the pungent odor of ether penetrated the recesses of my brain.

The drops upon the cloth became louder and louder, until at last they sounded like the dull roar of Niagara, while the conversation of the surgeons and attendants became more and more confused. At last I could understand nothing, although I still had my wits about me, and knew full well that the screen had been removed.

Suddenly I was seized with the fear that the surgeons would begin their work before I was well under the influence of the drug, and by a superhuman effort I managed to raise my hand and wave it feebly. It had the desired effect. A second later the mask was again applied, and the roar of the little drops of ether began once more.

This time I passed into oblivion. How long I remained in this state I do not know, but when I awoke I was in a bed in one of the private rooms of the hospital, and the little nurse I had seen in the operating-room was seated in a low chair beside me, slowly fanning me to take away the heat of the air and the effects of the drug. At a window near by sat one of the surgeons calmly reading a book and waiting for me to recover consciousness.

"What time is it?" was my first question.

"You must not talk," said the nurse, with a quiet smile. "Go to sleep for a while and you will feel better."

And I did. The sleep helped me wonderfully, and when I awoke I felt better than I had for some time, save for the pain of the wound. For many days I lay in that hospital, and when the wound began to heal and the flesh in that portion of my body began to itch, I had a fierce struggle with myself to keep from scratching the irritating point. Finally I triumphed, and within seven weeks I was able to leave the place and start over again.

I have left that portion of my anatomy for which no man has yet found a use within the corporate limits of Baltimore. On the books of the hospital I am classified as "perityphlitis," but to-day my disease would be known and recognized by the world as appendicitis.—George L. Macfarlane, in the St. Louis Republic.

AGED WOMAN SUFFRAGIST.

She Hopes to Live Long Enough to Be Able to Cast Her Vote.

Mrs. Emily Morrell Wood is the oldest woman suffragist in California. She hopes to live long enough to be able to cast her first vote. Just at this time the women are concentrating their efforts on California, and it is probable that universal suffrage will win in the golden State. Mrs. Wood is a native of New York and is upward of 86 years old. She went to California in 1850 with her husband in the bark Palmetto, of which he was part owner. The climate suited him so nicely that he decided to make California his home. Mrs. Wood has lived in San Francisco ever since. She was a schoolmate of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Her father and the father of Mrs. Stanton were judges on the same bench. Some years ago Mrs. Wood became afflicted with cataract and was totally blind for four years. A surgical operation was performed and her sight was restored completely. She is a great reader and is very fond of needlework. Her late husband was a partner of John Lorimer Graham, the famous New York barrister. She is one of the Anneke Jans heirs. Her great-grandfather was married to Rachel, who was the granddaughter of Anneke Jans. The old lady's memory of matters long since past is perfect, and her health is remarkably sound for one of her years.

A Great Scheme.

Borax (meeting a friend in saloon)—Why, Samjones, I thought you never drank.

Samjones—I do lately. I am told that Miss Mainprize has vowed never to marry a man who drinks.

Borax—But I thought you were dead in love with her.

Samjones—So I am, and I have to learn to drink in order to give her a chance to convert me to temperance.—Truth.

Half the people who pretend to make love, could be arrested for counterfeiting.

MAMMOTH PARADES.

GOLD AND SILVER HOSTS OF CHICAGO MARCH.

The Mightiest Demonstrations Ever Seen Upon This Continent—Tens of Thousands in Line, Viewed by Half a Million—City Suspends Business.

A Memorable Day.

Friday was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the burning of Chicago and the day was commemorated in that city by two of the greatest political demonstrations ever witnessed in this country. The day was given to a mammoth procession of gold men, and at night an army 20,000 strong of those favoring silver marched the streets with flaming torches and lusty shouts for their candidates.

Over 60,000 men on foot, on horseback, on floats, in carriages, all of them directly identified with the industrial and commercial activity of Chicago, occupied the down town streets from 10 o'clock in the morning until 4:15 o'clock in the afternoon. Some of them were millionnires, some of them day laborers, many of them employers and thousands of them wage-earners. This was the composition of what was admittedly the largest, best-managed and the most successful parade ever witnessed in the city. It was Chicago's own day, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the fire of 1871 and the quarter-centennial of the upbuilding of the city.

The arrangements were complete. From the moment the column started at the corner of Michigan boulevard and Van Buren street until the last section dispersed at Jackson and Market streets, six hours later, there was not a hitch. The police kept the streets clear for the marchers. They prevented the spectators from breaking through the lines, and they did it all with firmness and good nature. Gen. Joseph Stockton, the chief marshal, commanded the enormous army.

Ten o'clock was the hour designated by the Chief Marshal as the time for the movement to begin. The hands on the watch of the artillery officer represented an acute angle. He nodded to the gunner in charge of the battery section. The twelve-pound Napoleon spoke. Chief of Police Badenoch spurred his horse. The great procession was in motion.

The step was in quick time, and 15,000 men were continually in the line. As fast as they reached the point of dismissal they were hurried away. The slightest delay was prevented. The distance covered by each man in the actual line of march was three and one-half miles; his marching time was one hour and twenty minutes, while five hours was the time required for the procession to pass a given point.

Sixty Thousand in Line.

By actual count these were 57,733 persons in the procession. Of these, 52,231 were on foot; 2,274 were on horseback, and the others were distributed on floats, in carriages and on bicycles. On the floats were 980 men; in carriages, 370; the bands numbered 1,430 men all told, and 240 rode in tally-ho coaches. From the stock yards came 760 mounted men. One hundred and eight cyclists, acting as couriers, were in line, while the police numbered 150. Eighty-five brass bands and forty fife and drum corps furnished the music. Business firms represented by banners numbered 120, while ninety-six political clubs marched in the column. Among the wheeled vehicles were 178 carriages, 111 floats, thirty-seven tally-ho coaches and one electric motocycle.

Seven buglers of the Chicago Hussars announced the coming of the escort of the chief marshal, at the head of which rode Capt. T. S. Quincey, mounted on the black horse ridden by Major McKinley when the presidential candidate was in Chicago at the dedication of the World's Columbian Exposition. The marine band came next, and then the chief marshal, attended by his aids, passed.

One of the principal features was the living flag, formed by veterans carrying colored umbrellas in such position as to represent the stars and stripes. These men were heartily cheered all along the route, and when they reached the stand occupied by John R. Tanner in front of the Great Northern Hotel, the enthusiasm was immense and the cheering loud and continuous. The old Tippecanoe boys were too infirm to march, but they made a brave display in their thirteen carriages.

SILVER'S GREAT SHOWING.

Twenty Thousand Bryan Enthusiasts Celebrate Chicago Day.

The silver men owned Chicago Friday night. Twenty thousand of them tramped through the business center with torches aflame, red fire burning and cheering wildly for Bryan and Altgeld. They filled Tattersalls' building to hear free silver speeches and crowded around the score of stands which were built at street corners to take care of the overflow. They formed groups ranging from fifty to 200 persons in all parts of the district, and discussed the financial issue until midnight, and long after the cable cars had stopped running shouts for Bryan and Altgeld woke up sleepers in all parts of the city.

So far as numerical strength was concerned, the silver parade was outclassed by the gold parade of the afternoon, but in enthusiasm and noise the Bryan men led the McKinley men by a large majority. From the moment Grand Marshal Tolman gave the order to march until the procession broke up south of Tattersalls, the cheering, yelling and hurrahing was continuous, and every cheer for Bryan was echoed by another from the throng which bordered the line of march. The sympathetic enthusiasm of the spectators was one of the principal features of the demonstration, and women joined with the men in cheering for the free silver champion.

By actual count there were 21,548 men and women in the procession on foot, horseback, on floats and in wagons and carriages. Over 500 women and girls took part in the parade, and there were several hundred boys, who carried banners and were members of fife and drum corps. It was an old-fashioned torchlight procession, with some lime lights and hundreds of transparencies and banners. The silver men were short of bands, for almost all union bands in the city had been engaged for the afternoon procession, and they were compelled to make up the deficiency with fife and drum corps, but they were strong on horses, and the men from the stock yards made a good showing in their saddles.

The silver men were determined that their opponents should know their sentiments on the money question and their opinions of their political antagonists. They shouted their opinions with full lungs, and displayed their financial creed on transparencies. A favorite cry was "We see not paid to march, we march because we want to." Another was "Bryan, Bryan, Billie Bryan, we'll take him to the white house flying."

A West Side silver club caught the crowd by shouting, "We love Mark Hanna, nit." "No Yale dudes in these ranks," was painted in bold black letters on a transparency, and others were, "Bryan, Brain and Brawn, against Bonds, Boodle and Bluster."

HUSTLING HOOSIERS.

ITEMS GATHERED FROM OVER THE STATE.

An Interesting Summary of the More Important Doings of Our Neighbors—Weddings and Deaths—Crimes, Casualties, and General Indiana News Notes.

Minor State Items.

The house on the farm of Mrs. Hattie Almond, east of Plainfield, was burned. There was a small insurance.

The American Plate Glass Company of Alexandria, has started its factory, and 300 men were given employment.

Barnett L. Foster of Richmond, has placed his property in the hands of Lawyer Samuel L. Innis, as trustee. Liabilities, $2,850; assets supposed to be about the same.

Charles Robson, a well-known glass worker, died at his home in Anderson. He had been connected with the Victor Window-glass Company for two years, and was recently married.

Mrs. Amanda Parker, wife of William Parker, to whom she was married 65 years ago, died the other day at her home in Rushville, aged 81. She was a native of Kentucky and a resident of Rushville for forty years.

Miss Lillian Bush and her sweetheart, Charles Modlin of Anderson, both well known, had a dispute. Lillian left the parlor for a moment, and came back crying, and saying she had swallowed a large quantity of rat poison. She died during the afternoon, and young Modlin is almost crazed.

A lodge of the Daughters of America, the ladies' auxiliary of the Junior O. U. A. M., was organized at Albany, with fifty charter members. Visitors to the number of 150 were present from Muncie, Upland, Hartford City, and Dunkirk. A banquet was served. The work of initiation was done by the Muncie lodge.

An unknown disease is playing havoc with hogs in Lake County. In the past few days John Pierce, one of the large breeders of hogs in this State, has lost over $1,000 worth of hogs. The disease seems to be something new and becomes epidemic immediately after getting into a drove. Local doctors think the new disease affects the lungs.

James Wasson, a wealthy farmer near Bluffton, attempted self-destruction with an old sickle bar of a mowing machine. He cut gashes three inches long on each side of his throat, and an attempt to sever the large blood vessel in his left arm may cause his death. On a board he wrote: "I can't stand this any longer; have fought against it until I have to give up. Good-by."

Wm. H. Miller, one of the most progressive farmers near Plainfield, went to Martinsville a few days ago for treatment at one of the sanitariums there. He was seized with congestion of the lungs and died in a few hours. The deceased was a member of the Progressive Friends' Church. He was also one of the largest land owners in Hendricks County, owning more than 500 acres.

Sixteen-year-old Arthur Grooms of Muncie, made his second fruitless attempt at suicide within the last few weeks. His first attempt was with a pistol, but he proved a bad shot. A few nights ago he swallowed a quantity of strychnine, but hurried home and had his mother send for the doctor and the stomach pump. Unrequited affection is the reason given for his attempts at self-destruction.

While out driving Miss May Morrell, matron of the Orphans' Home in Marion, was thrown from her buggy against a high board fence, sustaining serious injuries, from which she died. Miss Eva Connsil, assistant matron at the home, was with her and was severely bruised. Miss Morrell has been in charge of the home for three years and her death is regretted by the citizens generally.

The Auditor of Blackford County has completed his report of taxable property in that County. The valuation by townships and cities is as follows: Licking Township, $1,314,495; Washington Township, $760,855; Harrison Township, $1,121,380; Jackson Township, $1,247,775; Hartford City, $1,804,395; Montpelier, $853,640; total, $7,102,235. This is an increase of $559,095 over the valuation last year.

A murder for $16 was committed at Fort Wayne the other day. George Frech, the 15-year old son of Henry Frech, was employed in the Bass foundry and was paid off and started home. His parents live in the suburbs and his way home led along the banks of the St. Joseph River in a sparsely settled neighborhood and the remains were discovered in a clump of bushes and partially submerged in the water.

Patents have been granted Indiana inventors as follows: Calvin F. Darnell, Indianapolis, fence; Henry L. Flesher, Prairietown, harrow; George E. Henry, Terre Haute, successive drive mechanism for machines in series; Louis J. Lemaire, Alexandria, regenerative gas furnace; Geo. P. Neal, assignor one-half to J. P. Thurston, Evansville, curtain pole bracket; William S. O'Brien, Lafayette, wagon wheel; George A. Phillips, Columbus, registering device; James B. Scuman, Columbia, grain cleaner and separator; Barton R. Shover, Indianapolis, and F. P. Townsend, Asbury, N. J., electric railway system.

Officer Mackessy found a stranger wandering around at the Big Four station at Lafayette. The man was silent, and the officer placed him in jail, where he has been ever since. He has not spoken for two weeks. He walks back and forth in the corridors of the jail almost incessantly, the forefinger of each hand extended, and in walking back and forth he touches the same bars of the cell with the same finger every time. Every effort has been made to induce him to talk, but without avail. He had no money. His clothing is marked "A. Murdock," and this is all that is known about him. The man is about 50 years old, five feet ten inches tall, with dark hair turning gray, and weighs 180 pounds. It is said he boarded a Big Four train at Twelfth street, Chicago.

While her parents were absent, Ivy Harrell, the 10-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elijah Harrell of Hanfield, five miles east of Marion, attempted to make some taffy. Her clothing caught fire, and before the flames could be extinguished she was so severely burned that she died.

Dr. Dougan Clark of Richmond, is dead. He was the most prominent minister in the Friends' Society in the West, and had a national reputation among members of the denomination. Two years ago he was forced to resign as a minister because he submitted to the rites of baptism, which is against the doctrine of his church.

Letters from Michigan, where Mrs. Henry Ingraham of Anderson, was taken during the summer, indicate that the end of her remarkable enforced fast is surely at hand. She has become so weak that it is impossible for her to receive impressions of what is going on around her, and has at last lost even the power to whisper. She now weighs less than 70 pounds, and is a pitiful object. Her case is still puzzling the medical fraternity. The fast began in February, when she lost all desire for food. At the same time her stomach seemed to be paralyzed, and she was unable to force anything upon it. She weighed over 300 pounds then. She has received practically no nourishment since then, and is now almost at the 200-day mark.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"How many shall we be?—Miss Smythe and Mr. Tannson make two, six O'Briens and Dr. Werner make nine, four gentlemen and five ladies, without us three; that makes twelve. We must find two more gentlemen. Four young ladies and two young men, won't do."

The speaker was Mrs. Denbigh.

"No, we should get into a 'quorl' with the O'Brien girls," said Nora, laughing. "But whom shall we ask?"

"I suppose Kummel."

"And the Gymnaisallehrer," suggested Elizabeth.

"No, he'd invoke the goddess sage and holy, divinest melancho—ly."

"I wish, Nora, you had never heard of Milton!" exclaimed the blue-stocking, indignantly.

"I've an idea," cried Tom.

"What?"

"Invite Meyer's uncle, the Von."

"Tom, you're a wise boy, and a treasure in the way of a cousin, but, unfortunately, we don't know the Von," replied Nora.

"Doesn't matter. He said the other day he'd like awfully to know you, and I told him I'd get him invited."

"Vivent les cousins! Mother, we'll invite him. With a Von in uniform for her neighbor, 'Shorlot' will titter her little soul out; and as for 'Morgoret,' she and Kummel will get on first rate. Mr. O'Brien and Miss Smythe will make a neat couple, and Tom Thomson and Mrs. O'Brien form a pretty contrast. Now all the ladies are provided with gentlemen, except you, mother. Whom could we invite to meet you I really don't know, unless, of course, we could induce Meyer himself to favor us with his company."

It was not until the laughter at this consense had subsided that the invitations were really written and sent.

The best china was then looked out, a truly harlequin set of mutilated but peerlessly fine porcelain, as purchased by Mrs. Denbigh on her various expeditions to the "Alte Market."

What would half the women of England do, were it not for the existence of that dissyllable "fancy?" With it, and its twin sister, "You don't mean it!" even the least eloquent of Albion's daughters are never resourceless. Well, it tries a man's patience when he is stating his honest opinion, to be interrupted every minute with the intimation that he doesn't mean it. But "fancy!" "fancy!" is really such a very harmless exclamation, that I am sure half my readers will sympathize with Miss O'Brien in what I am going to relate. It was at the Denbighs' tea party. Mr. Kummel had been conversing with Margaret on some apparently commonplace topic, when, for about the tenth time, she leaned forward, and with that air of breathless interest common to a certain type of young lady, uttered the dissyllable "Fancy!"

Now, Germans are of an inquiring bent of mind. Germans also drink their tea out of their spoons. Herr Kummel, in the very act of raising a spoonful of tea to his lips, with little finger gracefully extended, stopped midway:

"Kindly, miss, do say me what you mean by 'fancy?'"

If Meyer's uncle, the "Kadett," the "Von," had at the same moment turned to Margaret's sister, the irrepressible "Shorlot," and had asked her, with the same politely solemn air: "Kindly, miss, do say me what you mean by tittering," that young lady could not have looked more nonplussed than did Miss Margaret.

Happily, Herr Kummel's attention was at that moment diverted by the voice of Nora:

"Is your tea right, Gerry?"

"I'd like some more milk, please, Miss Denbigh."

"Cream, Gerry."

(The admonition, in a whisper, was accompanied by a sigh, heaved from the depths of the maternal bosom.)

"Well, if ye've got any cream, Miss Denbigh, I'd like that."

Gerry was bent on obeying.

Mr. O'Brien smiled. Mrs. O'Brien groaned. Nobody spoke.

"Won't you have some more cake, Gerry, dear?" asked Nora.

"Yes, thank you, Miss Denbigh—if I may sit under the table to eat it." A wise child was Gerry to make that condition, and a happy man would Tom Thomson have been could he have crept under the table with his tea, his cake and his shyness, like little Miss O'Brien.

Meanwhile—were his eyes not deceiving him? Decidedly the cloud had broken; it was raining.

Here was a theme for conversation.

With a smile playing about his lips the nervous Scotchman turned to the Irish lady.

"That auminous cloud has broken; it is raining."

The matron started, it must be admitted not without all reason. Tom Thomson was always a startling apparition, and as he now raised his great eyes and fixed them on the blooming face of the Irish lady, informing her in a cheerful tone that the auminous cloud had broken, and it was raining, Mrs. O'Brien was not altogether to blame in concluding him to be, as she afterward declared, "out of his senses." It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good, but it is also a rare wind that blows nobody any ill, and the cloud that bursting afforded Mr. Thomson a theme of conversation, could be anything but welcome to a lady clad in light summer apparel, and this just when the "party," as she whispered in an agonized tone to Mr. O'Brien, was drawing to a close.

Hence the unresponsive manner in which she received the communication made with a smile by her neighbor. Caledonia and Erin had failed to understand each other.

"Morg'ret, dorling!" and Mrs. O'Brien gazed in the direction of her eldest daughter; but that young lady was listening to a glowing speech on Englishmen by Mr. Kummel, whose enthusiasm for the nation dated since his making the acquaintance of what he called her "charming she-friends," Miss Denbigh (by which he meant Elizabeth) and Miss "Mary," as he called Nora—evidently under the delusion that she was the younger sister, and that "Mary" was a safe name to give her.

Meanwhile Mr. O'Brien, senior, and Miss Smythe were exchanging their views on Germany, and, neither of them knowing the least thing about the country, its customs or its literature, they found their views agreed in the most striking manner; Miss Smythe abusing the country and its customs in the strongest terms; Mr. O'Brien doing the same, and pooh-poohing the literature into the bargain, starting from a poet whom he called "Gaity," and whose masterwork he stigmatized as an "incomprehensible rigmarole, written moreover in the most abominable English!"

And pray, I hear somebody ask, what were the Misses Denbigh doing all this time? Were they as silent as the Scotchman, or is something being reserved for a "bonne bouche?"

Elizabeth Denbigh, the strong minded, the man hater, had "made an acquaintance that closely affected her heart."

CHAPTER XXIV.

"Mother, what would you say to a son-in-law?"

"What, dear? You don't mean to say Nora has engaged herself. Hush, here she comes."

And Mrs. Denbigh left the room, her finger on her lips.

"Well!" said Elizabeth.

"Well!" said an echoing voice.

"Is that you, Tom?"

"That's me," answered the grammarian.

"Tom, dear——"

"What do you want, that you're dearing me?"

"Come, Tom, for once don't be an imp. Tell me, what would you say to a marriage in the family?"

"A marriage in the family?" Tom's face grew pensive. "So Nora's going to marry?"

Nora! nothing but Nora! Here was Nora herself; could she be made to understand?

"Nora, dear."

"Well, Bet?"

"I'm engaged" (impressively).

"Dear me!" (sarcastically). "Nobody wanted you, I'm sure."

This was the last straw that broke the camel's back.

Elizabeth laughed till the whole room shook.

"Hm! you don't seem so occupied after all," remarked Nora dryly, unable to forget the pompous manner in which her sister had announced that she was "engaged."

The misunderstood maiden jumped up.

"There's nothing for it but to hold a meeting. Stay here, Nora, while I call the mother and Tom."

The summoned ones appeared, and never did orator more stun his audience.

"Family, I'm going to confess. I mean—Harry O'Brien—proposed to me yesterday—and—and—I accepted him. I hope, family, you've no objection."

Having delivered herself of this speech, Elizabeth rushed out of the room.

Now, certain it is, strong emotion was written on the faces of Mrs. Denbigh, Miss Denbigh and Mr. Tom Denbigh. Yet not an Ah! Alas! Oh! Hurrah! Huzza! Ha! Hush! or Hark! escaped them; so untrue it is that "strong emotion" ever finds vent in words. It was not until a full minute after the exit of the speaker that Mrs. and Miss Denbigh, having had time to grow calm, simultaneously passed their hands across their foreheads, and, simultaneously, delivered themselves of the one word "Wonderful!"

"'Stremely," said a small voice; then, putting his hands in his pockets, Tom left the room, adding only, while a look of ineffable contempt spread over his face:

"She did it to be 'centric."

"But, Betty, how did it begin?"

"It didn't begin at all."

"Don't talk nonsense, Bet."

"I tell you again it didn't begin at all, in the way you mean. Harry says it began at the railway station."

"When you gave him that freezing welcome?"

"Yes; he declares that settled him."

"Odd."

"Very odd. I told him I thought so too. Well, he never spoke two words with me alone since then, until last night. He was going away, and you were all surrounding Mr. Thomson or somebody, and we got to stand apart, somehow."

"There are always 'somehows' in love affairs—somehow."

"What do you say, Nora?"

"Nothing; go on, Bet."

"Well, we got to stand apart, and then he told me that he was in love with me, and I—well, I knew that."

"You knew that?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"Inspiration, I suppose" (quietly).

"Bet, you're splendid; go on."

"Then he proposed."

"And you?"

"Declined."

"And he?"

"He said he was quite satisfied."

"Odd!"

"Very odd. I thought so too, family."

"'Strordinary!" The speaker was Tom, who all this time had stood with his hands behind his back, looking at the "'centric" damsel. "'Strordinary!" he repeated.

"Well, family, I suppose you guess already the romance didn't end there. He repeated that he was quite satisfied; that he had never imagined I would say yes when he asked me. But I might think over it and change my mind, and then, with a prophetic outburst 'Lisbeth, I know—I know you'll listen to me some time!' If the moon had not bounced out from under a cloud in the same moment, it would never have been, I know, family. But out it flew and lit up the scene, as they say in novels, and there he stood, looking so crestfallen after his little outburst a la Disraeli, that I put out my hand and—I suppose it was my fate and I—I do love him so!"

CHAPTER XXV.

It was plain Tom was not a little disgusted at the conduct of his strong-minded cousin. It was inconsistent, and the man of nine felt that. It was his first initiation into the ways of girls; it made him feel skeptical. Here was a girl who, for nine years past (he dated his experience from his cradle), had, day after day, assured him that she despised the whole race of man, and what had she done?—deliberately fallen in love. The question now was—and a very important one it appeared to the young man, as he sat down on a stone, in the little garden before the hous; a stone of tragic association, for on it was engraven: "Here lieth Bobby, the ginny-pig"—the question now was, thought Tom, as he pensively contemplated one fat leg, the sock on which had vanished into his boot—if Lizbeth, the hater of men, could so suddenly change, was it not possible, nay, to be feared, that other young women who professed no such hatred might suddenly act in the opposite manner? There was Gerry, for instance—why, she stood before him, and now—he knew that!—Gerry never could bear to see his socks untidy; with her chubby hands she pulled them up out of his boots and began "settling" them.

What a nice little girl Gerry was! But, bah! she was only a girl after all. No wonder the young man should heave a sigh. As for Gerry, she was far too happy to notice that. As she looked up at Tom, her eyes were overflowing with merriment.

"'Magine, Tom—a mar'ge!"

But Tom was in no smiling mood, and the marriage, or "mar'ge," as Gerry called it, was the very cause of that circumstance.

"S'pose," he said cynically, looking down at the little girl, who was giving his sock a last smoothing, "s'pose, Gerry, when you're a woman, you won't marry?"

"I, Tom? Don't ye know I'm going to marry you? It will be such fun calling each other Mr. and Mrs. Denbigh."

Gerry's parents adhered to the affectionate old style of address, and Miss O'Brien, as was evident, thought this a necessary part of matrimony.

Mr. Denbigh, however, whom she thus frankly reminded of her intention to marry him—Mr. Denbigh, still contemplating his leg, asked the following solemn question:

"Gerry, have you 'pinions?"

"What's that?"

Gerry started. Tom seldom spoke so solemnly.

"'Pinions, Gerry? I wonder you don't know what 'pinions are."

This was only an ignoble means of gaining time, of course. Gerry blushed, and felt she ought to be ashamed of herself, whilst Mr. Denbigh racked his brain to think of a good definition.

"'Pinions, Gerry—that's when a girl takes it into her head she's shu-perior to us."

"Shoe—what?"

"Shu-perior." (With a look of impatience.)

Gerry would much have liked to know what shu-perior meant, but, remembering her humiliation of before, refrained from asking.

The question was a difficult one to answer, and Gerry, really afraid of compromising herself, had half a mind to put her pride in her pocket and risk asking what "shu-perior" meant, when another thought struck her, which proves that in the smallest atom of womanhood lurks an atom of woman's wisdom. Putting one arm round Tom's neck, and laying her soft little cheek to his, she said:

"I think you're a very nice boy, Tom, and—look here!" (producing a bag of sweets) "this is the sort that melts in the mouth."

Well, one may be a cynic, but a man of nine must be more than cynical to withstand such wiles as these.

Tom took the sweets, and kissed the sweet little giver.

Crunching a juicy ball between his teeth, he said:

"I don't believe you've 'pinions, Gerry."

And Gerry, she also crunching a sweet, replied:

"I don't believe so either, Tom."

CHAPTER XXVI.

In the English quarter of Ecks there still lives an odd English couple—foreigners make no distinction for those living north of Tweed. In the third story of a "genteel" looking house, Miss Smythe-Smythe still makes spills, and insists on Tom's using them; still makes experiments in crochet to find out a neat pattern that will require next to no cotton; still wears a black silk cap, dress, and apron, and insists on reciprocal use of her ear-trumpet; still sometimes talks of the Denbighs, especially Nora, "who must be married a year now, Taum."

"Ay, indeed, aunt."

"Taum" has found it impossible to make Miss Smythe believe that the married Miss Denbigh is Elizabeth, not Nora. His aunt to this day maintains that it was one of "Lucy's misplaced jokes," when that young lady, upon bidding her farewell, raised her voice to an unnecessarily high pitch, informing her through her ear trumpet that she was going to be married. Miss Smythe-Smythe admits that she may be Scotch, and the Scotch may be unable to understand a joke, but "Lucy" (as she still calls Elizabeth) came to the wrong person when she thought to make her believe that.

As for "Taum," he, too, has changed little since we last saw him. The great blue eyes still stare vaguely but kindly into the world, and many are the acts of chivalry done by the strange Scotchman whom the girls all treat as a brother. "Only Tom Thomson!" "Who minds Tom Thomson?" "Dear old Tom Thomson!"

Not a girl in Ecks but knows and loves our friend, whom at ten o'clock every day you will see at the "parade," in lightest of kids, with a flower in his buttonhole, for—murder will out—Tom Thomson is a bit of a dandy.

"Mrs. O'Brien, you have clearly no heart!"

The O'Briens, with the exception of young Mr. O'Brien and wife, have returned from Ireland. Here Margaret has just married what her family call a "borrister," whilst Charlotte is developing into a dignified young lady. Gerry and Tom only see each other at distant intervals, the latter having been sent to school; but, as Gerry has not yet developed "'pinions," their friendship has not diminished in the least, and they keep up a lively exchange of short letters, written in a non-sensational style on ruled paper.

As for the Denbighs, Mrs. and Miss Denbigh are still professional women, and as such have taken up their abode in London. Nora's income is not yet so large that she no longer needs to study the shop windows, to enable her to indulge in the luxury of a "sweetly pretty" wardrobe. Then, there is mother still to dress, and Bet—of course, Bet will never learn to dress, and looks, as ever, hopelessly far from stylish. Among other old habits, Miss Denbigh has still preserved that characteristic one of "dropping bows" on accidental tears, etc. Her brother-in-law does not spare her with banter. To this gentleman Elizabeth, in an unlucky moment, confided the story of the tablecloth, and Nora is probably destined never to hear the end of it.

Mrs. Denbigh has kept no less true to her old self. On her last birthday her children presented her with a Sevres tea service; yet so strong is the force of habit that Nora declares she has not yet learned to use it without trepidation, lest the handles should melt off. This statement, it is but just to add, Mrs. Denbigh declares to be a base falsehood. Her girls, she says, were always, and will ever be, incorrigible in their lack of filial respect. Considering the heart-breaking evil of their ways she not rarely simulates a despairing expression. It is commonly remarked, however, that not even then does the smile vanish from the deep-brown eyes, nor is there any increase in the faint lines that time and its train of sorrows have traced on the broad, high forehead.

And what of Bet, the apostate? Why, it is to-day "mother's" birthday, and in she walks, followed by Harry, to whom she pompously hands her gloves, having relieved herself of that incumbrance. As the young man takes them and carefully folds them up, with just a faint twinkle in his merry gray eyes, his sister-in-law, Nora, exclaims, "Poor fellow! what a life you must lead!"

Sympathy is sweet to man; the pitied one tries to look miserable, but fails. And then Bet produces from her pocket a note.

"Sit down, Harry" (feigning a tragical air). "In the presence of my family, I mean to make you my first confession. Put a straw to his back, Nora; he'll need it. This letter is from the only man I ever smiled on, previous to knowing you. Don't start, dear. He had a melancholy cast of features and a humble mode of speech that took my fancy. But it was not to be. The feeling was all on my side. He married shortly before we left Ecks, and now, hark!" (She read the letter; then, flinging it from her, struck an attitude. "This, family, to me! Come!" (changing her voice) "without delay I insist on our drinking to the health of the twins. Look at that individual! Did you ever see such a picture?" (she pointed to her husband).

Between laughing and struggling to look tragic, Harry O'Brien did indeed present a curious aspect.

A letter was brought into the room just then. It was for Nora, and she flushed as she glanced at it, for it was the second she had received from the same source within a week. She slipped it into her pocket, and for the present kept her secret.

The secret that Tom Thomson, plain, practical, but honest-hearted Tom, was to be in London a few days later to ask her mother to make her home with them, should Nora consent to become his wife.

"So I was not your first, your only love, Bet?" asked Harry.

"Was ever man so vain! That you weren't."

"This is a bitter pill," and Mr. O'Brien sipped his wine.

"I hope that helped you swallow it," said his wife.

Thus, amid merriment and banter does the evening pass; but before the little party breaks up, Nora plays the pieces her sister and brother best love: the "Ballade" with the story in it, "L'Hilarite," with its peals of laughter, and the piece called "Night," ending in a sob. And as the pianist plays them—is it the memory of old times and of another listener that inspires her?—her whole soul is at her fingers' ends, and the girl in the picture hanging on the wall seems to smile down on her—Dorry, who is buried far away in the steppes of Russia, beside the river that dragged her to its depths; Dorry taken from her dear ones in all her sweet fresh girlhood. And what does Dorry say to the little company gathered beneath her picture?

Assuredly, what she had always said in life:

"That's right, dearies; be a jolly family!"

(The end.)

Saved by a Drink.

A child 6 years of age had developed a bad habit of rising in the night to drink from the water bottle, and had been forbidden in vain. On the night of a recent storm his parents being away, his aunt tucked him safely in bed.

"Now, Dickey," she said, "remember I can tell if you go to the water bottle."

"Oh, no, auntie," he smiled, slyly, "how can you?"

"I can tell," she said, with conviction.

"But how?" said Dick, skeptically.

"I can," she repeated; "and since you won't promise, you naughty boy, I shall empty the bottle." And she did so, to the young reprobate's consternation.

In the middle of the night the gable of the house was blown down, and crashed like thunder through the ceiling of master Dick's room. As his aunt and the servants rushed in a terrible sight met their gaze. The bed was almost hidden by masses of bricks and masonry, two iron feet at the head being driven completely through the floor. With a shriek his aunt fell on her knees. "O, Dicky! poor Dicky!" she cried. "He's been killed."

The words had hardly left her lips when there came a light, faltering step from the bath room and as they turned there stood Dicky, his teeth chattering with cold, a candle in one hand, and a full water bottle in the other. For a full moment he surveyed the bed with its ton or two of debris, and then shook his head with sorrowful admission.

"Yeth, aunty," he declared; "you thed you could tell if I did."—Boston Globe.

Men and Their Hats.

"Well, well," remarked a leading hatter the other day; "everybody has smiled at the vanity of women as they take long and fond glances at their reflections in the store windows, but woman is not a marker for the ordinary man. The uglier a man is the longer it takes him to suit himself with a hat and the oftener does he look into the glass while buying one. I have an unusually unprepossessing customer, who would exhaust the patience of a Job. He came into the store the day after the spring styles arrived and consumed two hours and ten minutes in getting a hat that pleased him. The next day he returned the hat and had one made to order. This man is so ugly that nothing could improve his looks but a mask."—Philadelphia Record.

To glorify the Princess Eulalie by putting an eight-foot figure of her into a frieze in the National Capitol as a memorial of the World's Columbian Exposition is somewhat seriously proposed at Washington. It is a very amusing proposition at this moment, when the Spanish eagle and the American eagle are ruffling their feathers at each other, and it is not at all likely that the Goddess of Liberty will permit the Princess to be celebrated in any such way.—Boston Transcript.

Some One Must Suffer.

If a Chinaman dies while being tried for murder the fact of his dying is taken as evidence of his guilt. He has departed, but somebody must suffer, and his eldest son, if he has one, is therefore sent to prison for a year. If he has no son, then his father or brother gets a flogging. It's all in the family, and somebody has to pay for it.

Pope's Rich Plate.

It is doubtful whether any one has more gold and silver plate and other objects of value than the Pope. It is declared that were he to melt down all the medals, chains, vessels, and other objects preserved in the Vatican, the amount of gold obtained would make more coin than the whole of the present European circulation.

It is a pity that marriage is the only remedy that has so far been invented for curing a love affair.

HORRORS OF OLD WORLD PRISONS

THE sentencing of Dr. Jameson, the Transvaal filibuster, to the Wormwood Scrubbs jail for fifteen months has awakened universal interest in English prisons. The experience of this convict, however, is not likely to resemble that of those who have recently shown up some of the horrors of British home penal institutions. As a "first-class" inmate, Jameson will practically be a boarder, will have a complete rest from mental and physical fatigue, and, being a rich man, will be awarded courteous and humane treatment. Contrasted with this life, that of the ordinary convict is terribly hard, and the papers have teemed with details of the sufferings of Dr. Gallagher, the dynamiter, who recently went mad in an English prison. There are fifty odd large prisons in England, and in each one the same routine is followed. They are all under the control of the Home Secretary, and one set of rules does for all.

SHACKLED DAY AND NIGHT.

At 6 o'clock every week day morning the officers hurry from cell to cell to open each narrow dwelling. The prisoner hurries for a tub of water, with which he cleans out his little home. This is done under military rule. Then some of the convicts wash the cells, others sweep the pavements until they glisten, while all are watched by armed guards. A big bell summons the prisoners to work. Men hurry to the treadmills, the cranks. Carpets are woven, shoemakers bustle at their work, oakum pickers hurry to duty. At 11 o'clock the prisoners are marched in long files, lockstep fashion, to exercising yards. In each yard is a rope with knots about fifteen feet apart, so that 130 prisoners can get on the rope at a time. Each file grasps the rope and then at brisk paces for fifteen minutes whirl round in a circle. All of the prisoners, with the exception of the "first-class" have to work, although the work may not accomplish anything. For instance, the treamill or treadwheel is not a particularly useful machine, except to keep prisoners employed when there is nothing else for them to do.

TREADMILL IN ENGLISH PRISON.

Each tread wheel or mill is so constructed that if necessary twenty-four men can be employed upon it at time. The mill is divided into twenty-four little compartments or stalls, separated by high wooden partitions. The mill is connected with a fan, which is so arranged as to give enough resistance to the mill to make the words "hard labor" mean what they say. There are twenty-four steps in the wheel, which are eight inches apart. This makes the circumference of the wheel sixteen feet. The wheel performs thirty revolutions in each quarter of an hour, and each man walks on an average fifteen quarters of an hour a day. So he ascends something like 7,200 feet, for a day's labor. Crank labor consists of making 10,000 revolutions of a crank, which is placed on a narrow iron drum put on legs with a long handle on one side, which, when turned, causes a series of caps or scoops in the interior to revolve. At the lower part of the drum is a quantity of sand, which the cups scoop up and carry to the top of the wheel, where they empty themselves. A dial plate registers the number of revolutions made. A convict at ordinary rate of speed makes 1,200 revolutions of the crank an hour, so to turn 10,000 of them means about eight hours and twenty minutes' labor.

MASKED CONVICTS IN FRENCH PRISON.

WORMWOOD SCRUBBS PRISON, WHERE DR. JAMESON IS CONFINED.

There is something pathetic about the intimation contained in the dispatches to the effect that "Dynamiter" Daveney, on being released from Portland Prison, after serving thirteen years of his life sentence, inquired after Parnell, and was absolutely ignorant of the death of the great Irish leader. It is almost impossible to conceive the fact that men living in a civilized country can be so completely cut off from the outer world as to possess no inkling of what is going on around them. Yet that is one of the chief aims pursued by the prison authorities of the Old World. Only the other day the Belgian papers contained a graphic description of the astonishment manifested by an aged murderer, pardoned after completing forty years of his life sentence, when he beheld bicycles, electric lights, electric tramways and railroad stations.

O'Donovan Rossa, in giving his experience lately, shows up its tortures, and depicts his six years incarceration as a political offender as a season of horror and suffering. He claims that when English jailers know that a prisoner is hostile to the government, they proceed to "civilize" him into obedience or entire quiet. Under this system men have been starved into weakness until the skin and bones rotted, choked, trampled, lerred on and beaten on every possible occasion. An instance is known where a captive was put in the "black hole" cell, naked. No bed clothes were given him. Four wardens threw him down on the cold, damp cell floor, and one of them stepping back, ran at the victim, leaped in the air and came down with both knees on the prostrate man's chest.

HOW HIS MEALS WERE SERVED.

It is an absolute fact that English jailers are given to understand that Irish political prisoners are to be forced to submit to continual torment and indignity. For instance, a prisoner must polish his water can every day. At 9 o'clock the warden will tell him it is not bright enough; to polish it again. He will call him from dinner to repeat the process, and, if he fancies, the same thing will happen every hour until far into the night. In the same way prisoners are forced to scrub a cell four and five times a day, though they may be weak from exhaustion, faint with hunger.

In Chatham Prison a prisoner's hands were fastened behind him for thirty-five days. At meal times his hands were brought around to the front and the handcuffs again placed on the wrists. In making this change the wardens would press the handcuffs into the wrists and pinch the arms until they drew blood. A public investigation will probably follow the complaints made by victims of such cruelty. From the disclosures of manacled men who have tossed for weeks in cells, infested with mosquitoes, in absolute solitude, living solely on bread and water, and daily mistreated, it ness are so common in English political prisons.

A Tree that Stings.

There has lately been added to the collection of plants at the Botanic Gardens at Madras, India, a specimen of a strange tree. It is in size scarcely more than a bush, but other individuals of its species are known to have attained, in their habitat in the Himalayas, Burmah, and the Malacca Peninsula, the dimensions of a large tree, from fifty to seventy-five feet in height. The Madras specimen is surrounded by a strong railing, which bears the sign "Dangerous—all persons are forbidden to touch the leaves or branches of this tree."

It is therefore a forbidden tree in the midst of the garden, but no one is tempted to touch it, for it is known to be a "burning tree." This name is a misnomer, for the tree stings rather than burns. Beneath the leaves there are stings comparable to those of nettles, which, when touched, pierce the skin and secrete a fluid which certainly has a burning effect.

The sting leaves no outward sign, but the sensation of pain persists sometimes for months, and is especially keen on damp days, or when the place which has been wounded is plunged into water. The natives in the part of Burmah where this tree grows are in such terror of it that they fly in haste when they perceive the peculiar odor which it exhales. If they happen to touch it they fall on the ground and roll over and over on the earth with shrieks. Dogs touched by it yelp and run, biting and tearing the part of their bodies which has been touched.

A horse which had come in contact with a "burning tree" ran like a mad thing, biting everything and everybody that it could reach. A missionary at Mandalay, who investigated a leaf of the plant with his forefinger, suffered agony for several weeks, and for ten months felt occasional darting pains in his finger.

The Ant Eater.

Heavy body, thick, scantily haired hide, snout of portentous length, huge erect ears, most muscular limbs bearing heavy hoof-claws, all these features combine in a creature whose oddity is further borne out by a ridiculously small mouth and a ponderous tail. To be born, too, into a world of warfare without the remotest chance of ever possessing more than the simplest apologies for teeth—and those so far back as to be quite out of sight—seems a terrible disadvantage to a rather large animal, with much flesh on the bones, in a continent where great beasts of prey abound. Yet the aardvark in two slightly differing forms, has managed to occupy the whole of Africa proper, and to flourish there. Two things have stood him in good stead, namely, his unequaled powers of burrowing and his attachment to a food everywhere plentiful—the termites, or "white ants"—which he alone can always obtain. It is true, of course, that when the winged termites stream forth by millions from their fortresses scarcely a beast or bird under heaven fails to compete eagerly for the prey; but this is only a feast of short duration at a particular season, whereas all the year round the hardest "ant hills" of the termites are but pie crust to the claws of the aardvark, and their teeming inmates the helpless captives of his surprising tongue.

As far as his human enemies are concerned—and while blacks like the meat, whites approve of the leather—the nocturnal activity of the aardvark and his underground seclusion during the day have doubtless afforded him great protection. All who have essayed the task agree that it is no joke to dig out one of these animals, as he can burrow much faster than any one can dig; and even when by the combined efforts of a party of diggers, he is exposed to view, the extraordinary tenacity of his hold on the hard ground makes his removal uninjured no easy job.

Not Interested.

The Philadelphia American gives an amusing story of a distinguished English officer, who at one time was stationed in India. He was noted for his hobbies, one of which was amateur gardening.

One morning early the general was taking a stroll when he saw three or four private soldiers raking about the compound. Much pleased, he remarked:

"Well, men, nice thing gardening is, isn't it? I see you are taking an interest in it."

"Do we, indeed!" growled one of them in reply. "That's all you know. We've got an old fool of a general here who is mad on gardening, and we are sent here on fatigue to scrape this gravel about in case he should pass this way!"

Wendell Phillips' View.

I BELIEVE IN THE PEOPLE, IN UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE, AS FITTED TO SECURE THE FITTED RESULTS HUMAN NATURE LEAVES POSSIBLE. IF CORRUPTION SEEMS ROLLING OVER US LIKE A FLOOD, IT IS NOT THE CORRUPTION OF THE HUMBLER CLASSES; IT IS MILLIONAIRES WHO STEAL BANKS, MILLS AND RAILWAYS; IT'S DEFAULTERS WHO LIVE IN PALACES AND MAKE AWAY WITH MILLIONS: IT IS MONEY KINGS WHO BUY UP CONGRESS: IT IS THE DEMAGOGUES AND EDITORS IN PURPLE AND FINE LINEN WHO BID $50,000 FOR THE PRESIDENCY ITSELF.—WENDELL PHILLIPS.

It is Different Now.

When tariff was the main issue no name was too bad for England, no name too good for Ireland.

Now things are different. It will not do to say anything against England. On the contrary, she is a most progressive nation, blessed with noble, generous and able statesmen. The republican party loves her, even if the love is not returned. Each worships a common object—gold.

The real anarchist is he who seeks to violate the laws of nature for the exclusive benefit of a small fraction of the community.

During the present campaign the epithet "Anarchist" has been hurled at the heads of some of the noblest and most capable men that this generation has produced. The fierce searchlight of publicity has blazed upon these men for years, and not a single corrupt official act has ever been discovered.—Rev. Herbert U. Casson of Lynn, Mass.

This law-breaking, aggressive spirit of monopoly has found a perfect embodiment in the person of Mark Hanna.

HE TO-DAY TOWERS ABOVE McKINLEY AND ABOVE THE REPUBLICAN PARTY, THE AMERICAN BLUEBEARD WHO SLAYS HIS WORKMEN INSTEAD OF HIS WIVES.

The skeletons of the Seamen's union, the Miners' union and the Street Car Men's union hang bleeding in his closet!—Rev. Herbert U. Casson of Lynn, Mass.

I ASSERT THAT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE, AND SPECIALLY THOSE OF THE WEST, DEMAND THE FREE AND UNLIMITED COINAGE OF SILVER.—Senator John M. Thurston, July, 1893, before the Union Pacific road whipped him into line for gold.

COMMUNICATED.

AUBURN COURIER: It is not often I meddle myself with politics, and in fact heretofore the policies of the two old parties were such on the money question that it mattered little which one presided. On account of the great expense attached to attending National conventions only those who had a surplus of money could afford to attend as delegates; hence the wealth of the country has always dictated the platforms. The action of the present administration has been such that six months ago there was not a man who dared to insinuate that it was even worth while for the democrats to name a ticket; consequently the rich men who attended that rich men were selected as delegates paid but little attention to how delegates were selected or who they were. While they were abiding in the faith of wealth and reposing confidence in the ability of Hanna and England to carry successfully to election the men who will legislate to suit the money interests, who have elevated them to the position they occupy. Hence the people, the common people held a convention and from all reports it was one of the most noted conventions of this generation and adopted a platform which is in keeping with the speeches of great men of both parties which they made at a time when men could speak without being biased on account party lines. But I will not ask space in your paper to mention as all your readers know through the speeches and your columns what they have said and who said it, particularly the head lines which we see every day in your paper quoting McKinley in his "Double Standard Speech."

Now I desire to be as brief as possible and will disconnect the subject at this point and call attention to one point. I have read republican newspapers, listened to their speeches and talked to business men, farmers, bankers and laboring men of republican faith and I have the first one yet to meet who will not say that the passage of a free coinage bill will enhance the value of farm products. Granting this to be the truth, as its truthfulness is vouched for by all parties, what then is to every citizen's best interest (aside from money speculators) in this matter? All wealth is directly the product of the earth and whenever a law is passed that benefits the farmer everybody will participate in the benefit. For instance take our buggy factories which to-day are almost or altogether idle. Why? Is it because Hanna has hired them to shut down as some have said? No. Is it because they have supplied everybody with a buggy that needs it? No. Is it because the manufacturers have not been making money and are going to quit? No. Have they stopped because they are nearly all for McKinley and think they can make a few votes that way? No. Then why have they stopped and thrown men out of employment at a time of year when they most need their earnings? I will tell you why, it is because they have no orders to fill and the reason they have no orders to fill is because the farmer who buys at least ninty per cent of the product of our buggy factories gets so little for his produce that in connection with the destruction of the wheat and and oats crop and part of the hay, corn and potato crop, they are unable to pay some of the obligations they have already given and you will find that although they prate about the "birds building nests in smoke stacks of our factories" that they will be perfectly safe in using the same nests next year unless W. J. Bryan and a free silver congress is elected. The quotation following is a part of what Bryan said Saturday at Flint, Michigan.

"One of your bankers called a farmer into his office and told him that if I was elected his mortgage would be foreclosed, and the farmer replied to him that if Mr. McKinley was elected he could have the farm, but that if Bryan was elected he could not foreclose the mortgage because then he would be able to PAY THE MORTGAGE.

"This is a great city for the manufacture of carriages and wagons and buggies.

"I want to ask those who make wagons to think for a while and see whether they sell wagons to the financiers or the farmers. I want them to figure out how a farmer can buy more wagons when he gets less for his products. I want those who sell wagons to realize for once that their prosperity depends on the farmers who buy wagons, and not on the financiers who charge interest on the money that makes wagons. If you sell buggies, I want to ask you whether you are interested in selling more buggies than you do now. If you are you can only sell more buggies when more people are ABLE TO BUY BUGGIES.

When you lessen the number of people who can buy buggies, you have got to lessen the product of your buggy factories, and when you make less buggies you can employ less men in making buggies, and when you employ less men making buggies your storekeepers have less people to sell their goods to."

Those words are undeniable even though spoken by a candidate. And now though I did not vote the democratic ticket four years ago and while I have been counted for McKinley at the coming election it will be in the language of the Slangist, "McKinley"(nit.) Because I am going to vote for bread and butter for my family first, last and all the time, just the same as other people do who clip coupons and deal in like articles and vote the other way.

Now there is one more reason I want to give your readers for voting the democratic ticket this year and that is this, I am a firm believer in the justness of an income tax and as I have been pounding out my livelihood on a different manner from those who now would have to pay an income tax (as some in this town would have to do) I shall vote that way and I firmly believe that twenty-five per cent of the rich men of our cities who have changed their politics this year to vote for McKinley is more on account of the income tax than for any other reason. But it would not do for them to tell that, so they get behind a big chunk of silver bullion and curse the mine owner and damn the the free silver republican who is going to vote for his own interest regardless of party.

YOURS

For Free Silver and an Income Tax.

Buggy Stolen.

A single buggy was stolen from Mrs. Israel Ringler who lives on the county line west of Hudson. It has a green cushion, on which are some blots or stains. Right hind wheel has a piece of felloe put in to repair a break. Suitable reward will be given to anyone finding it or knowing its whereabout by calling on her or addressing her at Hudson, Ind.

Which is Right?

The position of the Republican party in this campaign is fixed by its platform adopted at St. Louis, June, 1896, as follows:

"We are opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained, the existing gold standard must be preserved."

This is the platform that Henry M. Teller, Cyrus G. Luce and other silver Republicans object to.

The position of the Democratic, People's National and Silver parties is declared by the Chicago platform adopted July, 1896, their platforms being substantially like it. It says:

"We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender, equally with gold, for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal tender money by private contract."

This is the platform that Grover Cleveland, John G. Carlisle and other gold standard Democrats object to.

The position of the Cleveland and Carlisle wing of the Democracy, which represents the present administration, and calls itself the "National Democratic Party," is defined by its platform adopted at Indianapolis, September, 1896, as follows:

"We insist upon the maintenance of the gold standard, and of the parity therewith of every dollar issued by the government, and are firmly opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and to the compulsory purchase of silver bullion."

As it is generally admitted that an international agreement is not possible now, it will be seen that the St. Louis Republican platform, which Mr. McKinley must follow if elected, is for continuing the present single gold standard policy of Grover Cleveland and his followers. On the other hand, if Mr. Bryan is elected he must follow out the platform adopted by the silver democrats, the silver Republicans, the People's and National Prohibition parties, and restore the free coinage of silver, as it existed before 1873.

WHICH SHALL IT BE?

The rank and file of the Republican party, and the leaders who controlled its policy, were always, until recently, for the free coinage of silver.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN was a friend of silver. Almost his last words before his tragic death were a message given to Hon. Schuyler Colfax for the silver miners of the west, telling them that the nation looked to the wealth they should develop to pay the great war debt.

JAMES G BLAINE, one of the greatest statesmen of this country, said in Congress on Feb. 7, 1878;

"On the much vexed and long mooted question as to the bimetallic and monometallic standard, my own views are sufficiently indicated in the remarks I have made. I believe the struggles now going on in this country, and in other countries for a single gold standard, would if successful, produce widespread disaster, in and throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value, must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property, except investments which yield a fixed return in money. Those would be enormously enhanced in value and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property."

JOHN A. LOGAN, another great Republican leader, said of silver, and the means by which it was demonetized by 1873:

"By a trick—and I use the word because it is a proper one in this instance—by a trick of legislation in 1873 the people of this country were deprived of paying their debts in silver dollars. The words 'gold dollar' were used in an act passed in 1873 for the mintage of subsidiary coin, and the words 'silver dollar' were left out, and by that character of legislation the silver dollar was demonetized in this country." [Cong. record, June, 1879]

SENATOR HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, to-day one of the foremost eastern Republicans, said in Congress March 9, 1894:

"The countries which owe money to England are becoming bankrupt one after another. The civilized nations of the earth are engaged in a vast contraction. The single gold standard policy, the effort to contract the circulation of the world, is an English policy, begun by England because she is a great creditor nation, with a view to increasing her profits, because she has a larger control of the commodity in which all other commodities are measured."

"Again on April 7, 1894, he said:

"The gold monometallic policy now in force among all great civilized nations is, I believe, the enemy of good business throughout the world at this moment."

All the old and trusted Republican leaders were favorable to the restoration of free silver coinage. The leaders of the Republican party to-day are Mark Hanna, John Sherman, Matthew S. Quay, Henry C. Payne, Thomas A. Platt and others, most of them millionaires, and all of them firmly committed to maintaining the present single gold standard.

WHICH IS RIGHT?

WILLIAM McKINLEY fully endorses the St. Louis platform and agrees if elected to carry out its policy. He says in his letter accepting the nomination:

"Until international agreement is had it is the plain duty of the United States to maintain the gold standard."

He is bound by every consideration and pledge to maintain a single gold standard until we can get the consent of England to abandon it.

GROVER CLEVELAND is also opposed to free silver coinage. In 1893 he secured the repeal of the law under which our present silver dollars were being coined, and since then only a small number have been coined, and these from silver bullion the government then owned. Cleveland not only stopped the limited coinage of the silver dollar, but he is opposed to again commencing its coinage. William McKinley believes just as Grover Cleveland does, and is against any coinage of the silver dollar. He says in his letter of acceptance:

"Upon the recommendation of President Cleveland both political parties united in the repeal of the purchasing clause in the Sherman law. We can not with safety engage in further experiments in this direction."

The arguments used by Mr. McKinley, in his letter of acceptance, against restoring the free coinage of silver and against further silver coinage without consent of other nations, are the very same arguments used by President Cleveland in his messages to Congress in 1885, and again in 1893, urging Congress to stop all coinage of the silver dollar. The positions of Cleveland and McKinley on this question are the same: they are both for continuing the present single gold standard, and against silver.

WILLIAM J. BRYAN represents the parties who are opposed to the policy of Grover Cleveland and against continuing under McKinley this present gold standard. The true friends of the double standard of gold and silver, by restoring silver to its place beside gold, are the supporters of William J. Bryan.

WHO IS RIGHT!

Senator Henry M. Teller, an old and trusted Republican leader, said at St. Louis, when a pledge to continue the present gold standard was forced upon the Republican party by the same money speculators who control the present administration:

"Having thus formed my conclusions, after many years of public service and investigation, can I look any man in the face and tell him that I believe this, and then give my vote for a candidate who stands on a platform pledged to support the gold standard? Would you expect me to do it? Would you not despise me if I did it? And what is more, would I not despise myself? If I am wrong—and of course I may be—the truth will some day be known. If I am right, you are entering upon a course that will some day, and that, too, speedily, bring to this country great disaster and dire distress. If a partial acceptance of this financial system has brought this country to the condition that it is now in, what shall be its condition when you have crystalized in the laws this declaration that you are putting in this platform, that gold and gold only shall be the standard money of this land?"

Senator Teller and hundreds of thousands who believe as he does are now working for silver and W. J. Bryan.

CHAS. A. TOWNE, Republican Congressman from Minnesota, on February 8, 1896, made an able speech on the duty of the Republican party to stand for restoration of silver as declared in its platform of 1892, and said:

"But what I say, Mr. Chairman, is that the Republican party must at this time make up its mind to do something. The people of the United States have passed a vote of confidence in the Republican party; that is all. We must now justify that confidence by being equal to the emergencies that confront the people. Our platform pledges us explicitly to the rehabilitation of silver, to make it 'standard money' even as gold is. The people want that done."

Yet at St. Louis the present leaders of the Republican party changed its historic position as declared by Mr. Towne and bound it and its candidates to a continuance of the present gold standard, except in the event of an agreement with other nations, for which we have been striving for twenty years and will never accomplish. Mr. Towne stands to-day for Bryan and silver.

EX-GOVERNOR CYRUS G. LUCE has grown gray in the service of the Republiban party. In a letter published September 3, 1896, he says:

"I dislike the financial plank in the republican platform. I strongly dislike McKinley's letter of acceptance upon this question. I believe in the use of both gold and silver as standard money. This country will never enjoy a reasonable degree of prosperity while they rely upon gold alone as a measure of value. McKinley's letter does not leave a peg upon which we bimetallists can hang."

In another letter published September 5, 1896, he says:

"I do not believe in the financial plank of 1896. I cannot suppress the convictions of a lifetime. My politics are, and have been a matter of conscience and judgment.

"PRINCIPLES MAKE PARTIES. PARTIES DO NOT MAKE PRINCIPLES.

"It is well to remember this great truth."

A vote for William McKinley means a vote for continuing the present gold standard and the financial policy of Grover Cleveland with all its attendant evils, which the people condemn.

A vote for William J. Bryan is a vote to discontinue the present single gold standard, change the financial policy of Grover Cleveland and by restoring silver restore the prosperity which existed before silver was stricken down.

WHICH IS RIGHT?

Political Notes.

Straw votes have been taken in some of the big establishments in Chicago. Armour tried it, but his men kicked and he gave it up. At another big establishment the men were given each a ballot for McKinley and for Bryan. Two boxes were put up, one for McKinley and the other for Bryan and a clerk stationed at each to watch the results. Nearly all the men went up and voted at the McKinley box to the great delight of the proprietors. But when the boxes were opened it was found that the few tickets in the Bryan box, were all right. But the McKinley box contained nearly all Bryan votes. It was a sharp dodge of the men, to keep the bosses from knowing how they voted or would vote.

Wm. Carr of Jackson gave a lesson in "sound money" to an advocate thereof the other day. Carr heard him talk awhile and then chipped in. "I dont have to learn 'sound money' or any finance from fellows like you who are being helped by Jackson township. If you could make a living without my taxes, I might take a few lessons, but not tell then." The man took a walk.

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. BUTLER.

Extra road work is being done in many places in the county. Hills are being graded down, low places being filled and long stretches of new gravel road are found in many places. Evidently Coxey's pilgrimage of rag-muffins to Washington is bearing fruit.

Death disturbed the quiet of our village again last week. Mr. Edson, the aged father of Mrs. Daniel Freeborn, quietly crossed the dark river last Tuesday night. Mr. Edson had entered his 85th year. He was a pioneer settler of Van Wert Co. O. He came to Indiana about twenty years ago and purchased the Joseph Rex farm in Stafford then owned by J. E. Freeborn He afterward lost this farm and moved to Hicksville Ohio where his wife died. Of his family of eleven children, three sons and eight daughters, only three, one daughter and two sons survive him His funeral was conducted by Rev. Dustman, a life long friend, neighbor and associate. His remains were interred by the side of his wife in Hicksville's beautiful cemetery.

Our church going people were rudely disturbed during their devotions last Sunday morning by the shrill and ominous shrieking of the fire whistle. The churches were quickly emptied, and the fire soon located in a dwelling on the corner of Oak and Canal streets, occupied by Frank Champion. The quick response of the fire Co., soon had the fire under control and saved the house after a stubborn fight of half an hour. The goods were removed with but little damage. The house was damaged to the extent of perhaps $75. Insured.

Albert Crooks of Minnesota came here to attend the funeral of his sister, Mrs. Isaac Hose.

Mrs. Cozzens who has been at the bedside of her sick sister near Pleasant Lake for the past month, returned to her daughter's last Sanday.

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A M Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

It is unsafe and in most cases impossible for one to select proper spectacles for themselves. At the same time at the democratic meeting, they were reading a strong speech in favor of free coinage, that he made two years ago. —The latest number of Dudley Foulke's paper, the "Civil Service Reform Chronicle" says: "With the defeat of Bryan the publication of the Chronicle will cease." Well, that will be some comfort anyway. The death of that snivel service affair will do much to take away the sting of defeat, if it should come.

It Saves Pain.

The Darlington, Wis, Journal says editorially of a popular patent medicine: "We know from experience that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy is all that is claimed for it, as on two occasions it stopped excruciating pains and possibly saved us from an untimley grave. We would not rest easy over night without it in the house." The remedy undoubtedly saves more pain and suffering than any other medicine in the world. Discussed The Question.

Mr. Welsheimer spoke in favor of the gold standard at the Comesky school house, No. 9, Jackson last Friday evening, and about the time he had got as far as "thirdly" asserted that silver had never been demonetized. A silver republican in the audience, took him up and insisted it had been demonetized. But Welsheimer insisted he was right, when his opponent produced a copy of the Chicago Inter Ocean and asked what the politics of the paper was. Welsheimer admitted it was a republican paper. Then the man asked him to read an article in it, that admitted that silver had been demonetized, Welsheimer declined and the man then read it himself. The speech became a discussion, in which the speaker found the farmer better posted than himself. As the audience were two-thirds democrats, populits or silver republicans, they went home tickled.

HANNA GIVES IT UP

Manager Privately Admits McKinley Can't Win.

DOOMED TO DEFEAT.

The Palmer and Buckner Ticket Is Simply a Decoy.

'Tis Openly Charged that the Indianapolis Candidates Will Be Withdrawn Just Before Election Day—Shameful Use of Money by Republicans—Bryan's Earnest Appeal in Congress for Railroad Men—Results of Recent State Elections Favorable to Silver—Usurycrats Are Scared.

From Democratic national headquarters in Chicago comes the assurance that Mark Hanna and the Republican managers have abandoned all hope of electing McKinley. This assertion is made positively and is based upon evidence of the most indisputable character. In a private conversation held at the Lexington Hotel, Chicago, a day or two before going to New York, Mark Hanna made these remarks:

"McKinley's chances are exceedingly doubtful. It is no use denying that we have lost the labor vote. Debs and his following have led the labor vote to Bryan, while the farmers are all crazy on free silver. I am afraid McKinley will not win."

These statements were made by Mark Hanna in the presence of two or three gentlemen whose names are known at national Democratic headquarters, one of whom gave out the information, and his reputation for veracity cannot be impeached. Mr. Hanna and the Republican managers will, of course, deny this; but it is absolutely true. This is not all. Mark Hanna's trip to New York was for the purpose of stirring up the Eastern bankers and obtaining enough money to carry, if possible, a majority of the House of Representatives. The money power has been informed that if it desires to defeat the passage of the free coinage act it must put its money into the Congressional campaigns. In order to divert attention from their own program the McKinley managers have given up the election of Bryan. This ruse will not work because it is positively known that during Mark Hanna's visit to New York he made personal appeals to the banking power, telling them that the only thing which will prevent free coinage will be a liberal disbursement in doubtful Congressional districts. He has given up all hope of electing McKinley.

Bryan's marvelous tour through the East, the intense enthusiasm and countless crowds which greet him on his return to the West, recent polls of Central and Western States, and the failure of Mark Hanna and his corporation satellites to coerce the labor vote has brought about this feeling of desperation in the breasts of the national Republican managers. Every poll that has so far been taken by the Republican managers in the Central Western States indicates an overwhelming majority for Bryan. They indicate a defection of from 20 to 25 per cent. of the Republican vote, while the Democratic gold defection is less than 2 per cent. The Republican managers have not been able to deny these facts. Every return made to Democratic headquarters indicates that the free silver movement is on the increase; every poll made of the Central Western States indicates a big majority for Bryan. In the Republican strongholds of the Central Western States the free silver feeling is most strong. The labor vote is shown to be for Bryan, as stated by Mark Hanna, and as already known by the national Democratic managers. The McKinley managers are making a big noise about the size of the Hanna gold parade in Chicago, but when it is remembered that at least 25,000 of the coerced laboring men who marched in the parade will vote for Bryan the Republicans have no reason for jubilation. Goldbug employers may compel their employes to march in a Republican parade, but, thanks to the Australian ballot, they can't compel them to vote for the Mark Hanna crowd. The McKinley managers have no hope whatever of controlling this vote at the polls.

The most conservative Democratic estimates give the free silver forces a large working majority in the next House of Representatives, while the present free silver majority in the Senate will be increased. The McKinley managers are simply desperate, and are trying by wholesale lying, wholesale debauchery and wholesale intimidation to stem the tide which is certain to engulf them in November.

Another thing that has carried consternation is the declaration of Governor Altgeld that Bryan will sweep Illinois by a tremendous majority. It is conceded by every intelligent voter in Illinois who knows Governor Altgeld that he is one of the most conservative men in the State, and never makes predictions unless he is assured of the fact. Governor Altgeld in a signed interview to the New York Journal says:

"I have been in all sections of the State, and I find the outlook very much more favorable than it was in 1892. We carried the State then by upward of 22,000 majority.

"From present indications I will say that Bryan will sweep this State by a tremendous majority. Hanna's hirelings are making much noise, but the people are with us.

(Signed.) "JOHN P. ALTGELD."

The great daily newspapers, and particularly those of Chicago, with one or two exceptions, are deliberately perverting and suppressing facts, and uttering falsehoods regarding the campaign. There are more than 200 Bryan meetings in Chicago every night. The audiences at these meetings range from 500 to 7,000, yet not one line appears concerning them in the McKinley press. These papers are continually making assertions that the Democratic campaign managers have abandoned Bryan; that Bryan is sick; that there is dissension in the Democratic and Populistic ranks; that the Democratic managers are without funds; that they have millions and millions of money wrested from mine owners; that the silver boom is on the wane; that the labor vote is for McKinley; that McKinley will carry Illinois and other Central Western States by incredible majorities. These lies are only a part of the plan of the McKinley managers to delude the public outside of Chicago. Their statements are lies—every one of them. As a matter of fact organized labor is overwhelmingly for Bryan; business men—with the exception of the large merchants and bankers—are also for Bryan; 30,000 Republican voters in Chicago are for Bryan; 30,000 Populists in Chicago are for Bryan; and four-fifths of the railroad employes are for Bryan. The Republican managers may make these men march in McKinley parades; they may make them join McKinley clubs; they may prevent them from attending free silver rallies, but they cannot prevent them from voting.

They Are Scared.

In connection with a description of the remarkable demonstration on the occasion of Bryan's visit the Philadelphia correspondent of the Boston Globe let some significant facts escape.

The correspondent says that old newspaper men and politicians who have seen the demonstrations in Philadelphia for years back agree that in numbers and enthusiasm the Bryan demonstration surpassed them all. There were 6,000 in the Academy of Music and 12,000 in the street.

As a corollary to this evidence of the popularity of Bryan, he affirms that he has it from the highest Republican authority that it is the intention of the Republican managers of the State to raise a campaign fund of $1,000,000, and that the banks that have never before contributed a cent to politics are making large contributions. In fact, he asserts that the banks are assessing themselves fixed amounts based upon the amount of their deposits.

Of course this contribution of the banks is ostensibly "for the protection of the depositors," but the Republic pointed out clearly the valuable bank privileges involved in the gold standard which unify the banking interest on the side of the Hanna syndicate.

Despite the vigorous assertions of the gold press that the Bryan demonstrations in the East mean nothing, the fruit of them in Pennsylvania is a million-dollar slush fund contributed by the privileged interests pooled in the McKinley enterprise.—St. Louis Republic.

Gold Is Coming Back.

This time last year when the banks and the big New York syndicate were trying to force issues of bonds, the papers were filled every day with stories of millions of gold going abroad. But now when the gold speculators are frightened by the issue which their greed has forced to the front, we hear of millions of gold returning.

Certainly there can be no business inducement for the shipment of gold from Europe to America, and if any is coming, and this is very doubtful, it is an English effort to bolster up McKinley's chances until after the election. If gold is coming back there is a political reason backing its return. Indeed, England is only lending it to American parties to help fasten the iniquitous gold standard on this country.

Republican Funds from Europe.

It has been a favorite myth of American protectionists, repeated year after year, though no free-trader could ever get a trace of reality, that money was collected abroad to aid the free trade movement here, and great has been the indignation worked up over this assumed interference in our politics. But here is a definite statement from a reliable source which shows that the raising of money for the Republican side of this campaign is not confined to the syndicates, trusts, corporations and capitalists on this side of the Atlantic. An American of character, writing from abroad, says:

"I have seen a subscription that has been opened at Monroe & Co.'s, bankers, Paris, for what is called the 'honest money' campaign fund, which means that money is being collected in Europe to influence the American elections. I have seen an appeal for this fund put up in the following language:

"'The main point is to realize your danger and to subscribe quickly and liberally. Remember that only sixty days remain in which earnest work can be done.'"

With bond syndicates and railroads and pools and trusts and corporations of all sorts to draw on at home, even the political daughter of the horse leech might be satisfied without going abroad. But McKinley is to be elected if money can do it.—San Francisco Examiner.

Ingersoll on Silver.

Macaulay once wrote that if the great moneyed interests found it to their advantage to challenge the law of gravitation, they could obtain the services of very able men to denounce and ridicule that best established of physical laws. This great truth is being exemplified in the present campaign. At Chicago the other night Bob Ingersol denounced Bryan and the Democrats for advocating the free coinage of silver. Here is a quotation from Col. Ingersoll's lecture on "Farming," as reproduced from the Illinois State Register and published in pamphlet form by G. S. Baldwin, 184 Madison street, Chicago—page 5:

"For my part I do not ask any interference on the part of the Government, except to undo the wrong it has done. I do not ask that money be made out of nothing. I do not ask for the prosperity born of paper. But I do ask for the remonetization of silver. Silver was demonetized by fraud. It was an imposition upon every solvent man; a fraud upon every honest debtor in the United States. It assassinated labor. It was done in the interest of avarice and greed, and should be undone by honest men. The farmers should vote only for such men as are able and willing to guard and advance the interests of labor."

PALMER AND BUCKNER DECOYS.

This Ticket to Be Withdrawn Just Before Election Day.

The gold Democratic ticket, the decoy ticket of Palmer and Buckner, is to be withdrawn in favor of McKinley just before election, and it is expected to throw consternation in the silver camp by the action. The scheme was made known at Grand Rapids, Mich., by a man in a position to know, and he broached it to a friend who is an unquestioned authority. It came up in a conversation in a hotel over election probabilities. One of them was a gentleman known all over Michigan who has been announced all over the State as being a bolter from the Chicago platform, and a well-known politician from Detroit, who stands very close to Joe Manley of Maine.

They were talking of the probabilities of Michigan going for Bryan and general chances of election, and the Democrat stated his belief that the gold Democrat ticket would be of material benefit to Bryan, for, while it would not poll many votes it would cut just enough figure in close States like Michigan to give Bryan the electoral vote. The Detroiter only laughed, and he confidentially stated that there will be no gold Democratic ticket in the field on election day.

"But what do they intend to do with it?" was asked.

"Why, it was all understood before it was put up," answered the Detroiter, and he mentioned as his authority the man who is reputed to stand closer than any other man in the United States to President Cleveland.

"We know very well that the thing is getting close, and that every vote will be needed to knock out this silver craze, and nobody knows this better than the President and his friends."

"But how can the Democrats stomach McKinley's protection ideas?" was asked.

"Oh, that is all understood," was the answer. "McKinley is only a figurehead in this business, anyway, and the real protection power in Congress is Tom Reed. There is no possibility of disturbing the tariff for two years, anyway, and Reed has promised that there will be no tariff tinkering under McKinley. Reed did not make that promise for nothing, and in return they are to get the work out of the decoy ticket until election, when it is to be pulled down and all the strength thrown to McKinley."

Bryan and the Women.

The women of the United States are for Bryan. They admire his honesty, his fearlessness, his ability. At all the Bryan meetings the American women have testified their admiration for the brilliant and brave candidate for free silver. They have espoused his cause because they understand that the country needs more money, and that free silver will restore business, set the mills going, and give to all money to buy bread and clothes for themselves and their families. Women are very determined in their opinions, and when they espouse a cause they do so with their whole heart and soul. They believe in Bryan—they respect, they admire him.

In the great struggles of the past the women have always played an important part. They have encouraged and counselled the men. A great European statesman once said: "If I have the women with me, the men have got to follow." Bryan is to be congratulated upon having won the women to his cause, and we call upon them to enter earnestly into the great struggle now in progress.

The United States is making a supreme effort to break away from the clutches of England, who would mercilessly force the gold standard upon us and hold us in her power. England is sending over ship-loads of gold to capture the American people.

Women of America, we call upon you to prevent your husbands, your lovers, your sons, your friends from casting their votes for the gold standard. It means slavery for Americans, with England for our master. Save the country, as you aided in saving it in the revolution. Save it that your children may bless you for tearing down the golden idol and restoring freedom to our land.

Silver Party's Estimate.

Secretary Difenderfer of the Silver party has given out his estimate of the result of the election. He gives Bryan 282 votes, McKinley 107, and makes the remaining fifty-eight doubtful, with the chances, he says, that a majority of the latter will be for Bryan.

The estimate is the first given by Mr. Difenderfer, and has been arrived at, he says, after a careful survey of the field and from information received at his headquarters. Regarding Ohio, Mr. Difenderfer says that from the beginning of the campaign the letters from that State have indicated that Bryan would carry it. "Since the first of the month," Mr. Difenderfer says, "our information from that State has indicated more strongly than before the defeat of McKinley."

As to some of the other States, Mr. Difenderfer said: "I believe that Maryland and West Virginia are for Bryan, but have put no State in that column unless I felt certain that it would be carried."

Here is Mr. Difenderfer's estimate:

Looking to Nov. 3.

Although there still remain a few weeks of the Presidential campaign, the lines are divided so clearly all over the country, that the indications of the result are already becoming apparent.

The Republican managers have apparently recognized that the demand for free silver is firmly fixed with the agricultural element. This is shown by the fact that they have practically abandoned campaigning in the rural districts, and are concentrating all their efforts upon the big cities, thus hoping to make up what they lose from the farming vote.

But the Republican campaign has been a failure from the start. It has been a parade of the moneyed interests and the men of millions and the natural result has been to open the eyes of labor, and to make the workingman recognize that those who have for years been oppressing him, are now united for McKinley. This is so apparent that organized labor everywhere has declared for the champion of free silver, and with it the leaders will secure the votes of the great majority of working men.

Another feature which has seriously crippled the Republican candidate is his evasion of the financial issue, and his refusal to face the masses and announce what policy he will pursue if elected.

In strong contrast with the picture of McKinley hiding in his cupboard is the true Americanism of Mr. Bryan, in meeting the masses, and boldly discussing the issues of the great political struggle. The American people naturally see that the Canton statesman is playing the skulker, and they have no sympathy for him.

Every day reveals that the prominence of Wall street and the conspicuousness given to the millionaires of the Eastern States is arraying the West against the great money centers. From present indications the free silver sentiment will carry all the States, west of Ohio, into the Democratic column, and even that State, which in 1892 gave but 1,072 plurality for Harrison, may be considered doubtful.

The Republican strength is confined almost entirely to the New England and a portion of the Middle States. Giving them all of New England and admitting the possibility of McKinley carrying the Middle States and Maryland, the Republicans would have but 128 out of 224 electoral votes necessary to win. Where to get the remaining necessary 96 is a question which it would bother even Mark Hanna to answer.

Giving Mr. Bryan the electoral votes of the entire Southern States and the Pacific coast States interested in silver, together with the Dakotas and Kansas, in which States the Populists are very strong, he will have 200 electoral votes. For the remaining 24 he has good fighting chances in Illinois with 24, Indiana 15, Iowa 13, Nebraska 8, Ohio 23, Wisconsin 12, and Michigan 14. Of these latter States Illinois and Wisconsin went for Cleveland in 1892, and the cause of Democracy seems to be much stronger now than it was then, because it has young, vigorous and honest management.

McKinley's campaign is one of desperation, while that of the Democracy is favored with the advocacy of a sentiment which is popular everywhere, except in the sections controlled by the money power.—Philadelphia Item.

Why He Joined the Gold Parade.

Yes, Sandy, I've been marchin' in th' gold parade to-day;
But, even if I lose me job, I'm goin' to hev me say.
The half o' them that carry canes 'nd
holler ez they walk
Are for free silver when they vote, 'nd gold men when they talk.

You see, it's this way, Sandy, lad; the bosses be for gold,
'Nd them that has to work or starve must do as they be told.
The boss he says: "Now, byes, turn out,"
'nd what's a mon to do?
Parade, o' course. I did that same, 'nd so, my lad, would you.

I have a wife 'nd child at home that look to me for bread,
'Nd when I thinks o' Mary Ann 'nd Nellie's curly head,
I do some things I wouldn't do, if I could have me way—
'Nd that's the reason I turned out 'nd marched around to-day.

I've heard the bosses promise now for lo,
these many years;
I've voted as they asked 'nd then repented, lad, in tears;
I haven't seen no good times yet, 'nd so it isn't strange
That me 'nd lots of other chaps are lookin' for a change.

We've had gold now these many years—at least some folks have had—
But you 'nd me have seldom seen the color of it, lad.
We've toiled to make the bosses rich, 'nd starved ourselves to pay
The taxes, while the goldbugs grew still richer every day.

I talk aloud for gold because it's policy to keep
A little roof above my head, a place in which to sleep.
But when it comes to votin'—then I'm goin' to vote to please'
Myself, 'nd not the men I serve by grindin' on me knees.

I'm going' to vote for Bryan, 'nd the reason why's because
I think some change is needed in the makin' of our laws.
They favor rich men as they stand, no matter where you go;
'Nd poor men when it comes to law stand mighty little show.

I'm marchin' with the goldbugs, but I'm toilin' with a crowd
That'll cast their votes in silence, for they dare not speak aloud;
But they'll find we've not been sleeping
when election day is past;
'Nd they come to count the ballots that the workingmen have cast.

Amusin'.

The funniest incident of this campaign thus far is the assertion by the Cleveland Leader that H. K. Thurber's economic opinions are not worth anything because he failed to properly manage his own business. If the Leader's man will join one of those Canton excursions he will find at least one other person in the Thurber class.

Those who favor the financial plank of the Republican platform are as follows: The bankers, money lenders, capitalists, monopolists, millionaires, bondholders, speculative promoters and all their parasites.

THE POLITICAL DECOY DUCKS.

It's an old trick; will the Democratic voter be caught by it?—Chicago Dispatch.

BRYAN'S APPEAL FOR RAILROAD MEN.

IN February, 1893, there was a debate in Congress on a bill to compel railroads engaged in interstate commerce to use on their cars couplers which would protect the lives and limbs of their employes. There was opposition to the bill, but William Jennings Bryan urged its passage. He said:

I for one am willing to stay here till this session ends, because I think this bill should be passed. I believe it is dictated by humanity, and I am not willing, if I can prevent it, that these men shall be killed and maimed just because some of the railroads insist that they cannot afford to put these couplers on their cars. The only objection that I have heard made, the only real one in that letter of Mr. Haines found on our desks this morning, is that it would cost $75 a car, or $75,000,000. Some 22,000 persons have been injured. Those of us who have associated with these men know that there is scarcely one of them employed for any length of time in railroading who does not have a hand off, or fingers off, or foot off, or is maimed in some way, and we have had produced here proof of the startling number killed. Now I ask, Mr. Speaker, does it not appeal to us, who are members of the only body which can give this relief, because States are powerless—does it not appeal to us and to our humanity to pass such laws as will give protection to the lives and limbs of these people?

The doctrine of non-interference has been invoked time and again, and often in vain, to protect the individual from trespasses upon his rights, and now, in this latter day, the doctrine of non-interference is invoked when the corporations of this country seek to trample upon the rights of the people and to disregard even the common duties they owe to humanity. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that we who are in favor of this bill and in favor of giving to these people that protection which the laws of Congress alone can give—I insist that we shall be as zealous in behalf of this bill as are those on the other side who see fit to oppose it.

I do not question their motives, but if we can keep this question in this position, staying here night and day, the country will notice it and public opinion will be brought to bear upon it, and we are willing to trust to our being sustained by public opinion. The platforms of both the great political parties have declared in favor of it; and, as has been well stated here to-day, before the election a bill was passed here without a division. At that time we who now favor it had upon our side many of those who oppose it now, or at least their opposition was not then made known.

Now we are supported by the platforms of both political parties, supported by the almost unanimous sentiment of the press, and supported, as I believe, by the great sentiment of the people of this country, can afford to stand here and fight this battle. Upon the one side are the interests of these men and their protection, and upon the other the cost to the railroads which this reform will impose if it is carried out.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, how can we measure the value of human life? How can you say that $75,000,000 expended in equipping cars outweighs 2,000 people killed and 22,000 maimed? We may talk this way about the lives of others, but what if these were our sons or brothers? I ask of any one of these gentlemen what price he would set upon the life or security of a relative? And how dare we hold at a trifling price the lives and welfare of those not kin to us, while we hold as a priceless boon the lives and welfare of those to whom we are related by blood?

I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to those who are in favor of this bill to stand by our rights here as a majority and protect the lives of these people who plead to us for protection.

Ruined in Cold Storage.

It is the decided opinion of all the epicures in eating and drinking that the cold storage arrangement now adopted by many hotels and restaurants acts injuriously upon liquids and viands, making them practically unfit to be taken into the stomach. It kills most light wines, and makes ale, beer and other liquor taste flat. Raw meats are kept well, but it is asserted that all game or fowl, whether cooked or uncooked, loses all flavor and delicacy when once subjected to the cold storage chemical atmosphere.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

HER HAPPY DAY.

A CHARMING STORY OF MEDICINE AND MARRIAGE.

Two Open Letters From a Chicago Girl—How Happiness Came to Her.

Among the tens of thousands of women who apply to Mrs. Pinkham for advice and are cured, are many who wish the facts in their cases made public, but do not give permission to publish their names for reasons as obvious as in the following, and no name is ever published without the writer's authority; this is a bond of faith which Mrs. Pinkham has never broken.

Chicago, Jan. 8th, '95.

My dear Mrs. Pinkham:—A friend of mine, Mrs. ——, wants me to write to you, because she says: "you did her so much good." I am desperate. Am nineteen years of age, tall, and weighed 128 pounds a year ago. I am now a mere skeleton. From your little book I think my trouble is profuse menstruation. My symptoms are * * * * etc.

Our doctor (my uncle) tells father that I am in consumption, and wants to take me to Florida. Please help me! Tell me what to do, and tell me quickly. I am engaged to be married in September. Shall I live to see the day? * * * * LUCY E. W.

Chicago, June 16th, '95.

My dear Mrs. Pinkham:—This is a happy day. I am well and gaining weight daily, but shall continue the treatment and Vegetable Compound during the summer, as you suggest. Uncle knows nothing about what you have done for me, because it would make things very unpleasant in the family. I would like to give you a testimonial to publish, but father would not allow it. * * * * I shall be married in September, and as we go to Boston, will call upon you. How can I prove my gratitude? * * * * LUCY E. W.

Just such cases as the above leak out in women's circles, and that is why the confidence of the women of America is bestowed upon Mrs. Pinkham.

Why are not physicians more candid with women when suffering from such ailments?

ONCE ON A TIME.

Once on a time a wife's heart bled:
The world was gay, the world was kind;
But one who should cherish had spurned instead,
And the days were long and for love she pined.

Once on a time another came,
His voice so low, his words so rich,
The bleeding heart of the wife in name
Felt the potent spell of the Cupid witch.

Once on a time a woman thought
To repair an error by one as deep:
Little she recked of the ruin wrought
From seeds sown only tears to reap.

Once on a time a month and a day
Were spent in laughter and love's sweet spell,
And then came the end, he went away,
Caring nothing if she fared ill or well.

Once on a time the wife then thought
Of the vanished name, the fair repute,
Of the spell of happiness clearly bought,
The words of respect that for her were mute.

Once on a time there came an hour
When she realized her great mistake;
The sound of music, the scent of a flower,
Did naught but the voices of memory wake.

Once on a time when the city slept
A frail, fair form to the river's brink,
Cowering and heart weary, closely crept
To hide her shame, no more to think.

Once on a time all this was true,
Fiction no place has on folly's page;
An illicit love was but born to rue,
And surely death is sin's own wage.

MISS NANCY.

November was growing old, and Miss Nancy Camp, who sat at the window watching the gray clouds shift across the sky in heavy masses, wished in her secret heart that it was gone.

"Who'd 'a thought it would hev come off so cold after such a warm spell, Nancy?" said a voice from the little bed-room that led out of the kitchen.

"It's moderating. I reckon it's going to snow," responded Miss Nancy.

"It's jest like the November when Jim Wilmot went out West," continued her sister reminiscently.

"Yes," was the low response.

"'Twas a real warm Thanksgiving, and then a day or two after it begun ter snow, and the 28th—you remember, Nancy—'twas the time they had the cle'bration in the schoolhouse, and you and Jim went—my, how it did blow and sleet! And on Sunday it was so drifted that Cousin Anne Camp—she thet was a Stevens, you know—couldn't git ter meeting. It was the first time in 'leven years thet she'd missed hearing Elder Dickens. She felt real bad about it," added Miss Abby.

Miss Nancy drew her chair nearer to the window and brushed her hand across her eyes. There was no sound from the little bed-room for a while. The big, old-fashioned clock on the high shelf ticked away the minutes, and Miss Nancy rocked by the window, with her hands folded in her lap.

"There's someone a-comin' across the old bridge," said Miss Abby, eagerly. "See who it is, Nancy. Likely as not it's that school teacher thet boards down ter Foster's, though it don't sound like their team. She must be a powerful sight o' trouble to 'em."

And Nancy pressed her face against the pane obediently, although there was a mist before her eyes that blinded her a little. The wagon came nearer and nearer until she could see that it had but one occupant—a man of about 40, apparently, with a beard that perhaps added a little to his age.

"Who is it, Nancy?" questioned Miss Abby, fretfully. "It ain't her, is it? My! It sounds as if it was coming in—in—here."

"I don't know," answered Miss Nancy. "Like enough he wants some directions."

"He? Lands! It's a man, then! Be sure to tell him us——"

But there came a heavy knock on the door and Miss Abby subsided. Slowly Miss Nancy crossed the room and turned the knob. There was nothing said for a moment. The man looked steadily at the figure before him; at the simply made woolen dress with its pure white collar and cuffs, the slender, blue-veined hands, the face with its firm mouth and faded blue eyes, the hair parted smoothly and with the same little wave in front that he remembered so well, and the high shell comb that was new to him. He saw the wrinkles, too, but he saw no more—the years of toil and trouble that must have brought them. All this he noted, and then held out his hand.

"Nancy, have you forgotten Jim?"

She gave a startled glance into his eyes, and a little crimson flush crept into her cheeks. It reminded him of the time he had kissed her in the garden back of the house.

"Who is it, Nancy?" whispered Miss Abby from the bed-room. "Do tell him ter come in and shut the door, and—I want some more fennel."

"Yes, Abby," answered Miss Nancy, opening her lips with an effort.

Jim Wilmot came in and closed the door softly behind him.

"Is Abby very sick?" he asked.

"She hasn't walked for six years," answered Miss Nancy, mechanically taking some fennel out of a dish on the table and going into the bed-room with it.

"Who is it?" whispered Miss Abby again.

"Jim Wilmot," responded her sister.

"Jim! Lands o' Goshen! Well, well! Who'd 'a' thought he'd 'a' turn up after all these years. Do tell him to come in here 'fore he goes. Jim Wilmot! Well, I never!"

Miss Nancy gave a little pat to the pillows, and then entered the sitting-room again.

"If you'll stay to supper, you'd better put your horse and team under the shed. We haven't a hired man now."

"Thank you," he said, gladly.

She sent him a little sly glance as he went out of the door.

In a few minutes he was back again, but the talk was a little forced. He told her how rough the life was out West when he first went; how, after many discouragements, a little prosperity came to him, and then he came on a visit to his folks, who told him that they lived touse at the little house, and that Abby was "s'ckly," though they didn't know she was a regular invalid.

Miss Nancy wondered, looking at the firm chin, and the hair that had been so brown now streaked with gray, if it was not very lonesome out there, and if he had quite forgotten the old days.

The clock at last warned her that she must be about her preparations for supper, and after excusing herself she brought in a dish of oranges to peel. She worked swiftly, though her hands trembled and felt "all thumbs." She had almost finished her task when an orange slipped out of the dish and rolled on the floor. Both stooped to pick it up and their hands met.

"Dear!" he said, holding out his arms.

Miss Nancy gave one glance into his face, so near her own, and in a moment was crying softly on his shoulder.

What mattered the years of waiting, the years of toil and trouble? Nothing mattered any more.

The clock ticked on and Miss Abby awoke from the little "cat nap" she had been enjoying.

"Nancy!" she called sharply.

Miss Nancy started and raised her crimson face with its new expression from its resting place.

"Wait a minute, dear heart," whispered Jim. "I want to know when you'll go back with me. I went away to make a fortune and a home for you. They're waiting. When will you go?"

"When will I go?" echoed Miss Nancy, bewilderedly.

"Nancy!" called Miss Abby again.

"I'm afraid I don't know what you mean, Jim," faltered Miss Nancy.

"Why, back out West. I've got a pretty little place there, with thirty acres or so, and nary a mortgage. You'll have neighbors, for there's other farms near, and you shan't work, Nancy. I'll get a girl."

"And Abby?" asked Nancy.

Jim Wilmot started.

"I had forgotten her," he said helplessly. "But where's the rest of the relations? Or why couldn't she go to a 'home' or—something?"

The flush in Miss Nancy's face faded and a little line of pain formed around her mouth.

"She'd never stand it to leave this place. She's lived here all her life, Jim," she said slowly.

There was a silence for a moment, then she continued, steadily:

"I shall never leave her; so good—good-by, Jim."

"And you'll sacrifice yourself and me fer a notion?" he replied hotly. "All right, then, I shan't leave my farm and settle down in this humdrum place jest fer the sake of your sister. Good-by, Nancy." And five minutes after the horse drove out of the yard and down the hill while one lonely woman strained her eyes for a last glimpse of it, and the gathering flakes of snow were already filling up its tracks.

She stood there a long while watching the sullen clouds and the snow that was coming thicker and faster. Little puffs of wind blew the flakes of snow against the pane, and Miss Nancy wondered vaguely if they felt unhappy because they melted so soon.

At last she roused herself and went into the bed-room. Miss Abby, tired of calling, had fallen asleep. She was thankful for the respite, and, going out softly, prepared her own supper and the invalid's while the wind blew furiously around the little old house and fairly shook its foundation.

She sat by the fire with her head on her hands long after her sister had eaten her supper, and being satisfied with the evasive answers to her many questions had gone to sleep again. But the fire had died down and it grew chilly in the little kitchen, so finally she, too, went to her night's rest. It was very late when she dropped into a light sleep and the morning soon came.

The day passed drearily. Miss Abby talked incessantly of Jim—Jim, until her sister felt she should scream or go mad; but she did neither, and was only a little more tender, a little more patient.

The night set in with a regular snowstorm. Miss Abby declared they would be snowed in by morning. The wind blew down the chimney with moans, like an uneasy spirit.

In the morning Miss Nancy was startled by the darkness in the little rooms. The wind had blown the snow in big drifts against the windows and door. What Miss Abby had feared had come to pass, and they were snowed in. But there was no cause for worry as yet. There was plenty of food in the pantry and wood in the wood box. There was no stock to suffer, and someone would surely go by before the day was over and discover their plight.

She lighted her lamp and did her work, though in a rather half-hearted way, and the day passed and no one went by, and the snow piled up higher and higher around the house.

Miss Abby was very little frightened at their situation. Indeed, her sister hardly knew what to make of her; she seemed a little wandering and confused things strangely.

The next day, late in the afternoon, it stopped snowing, but no one went by, and darkness came on again. Another long night. Miss Nancy left a lamp burning in the kitchen and then went to bed.

Very early in the morning she was suddenly awakened by a shout and the sound of someone kicking on the side of the house. She hastily dressed and then entered the sitting-room.

"Hi!" someone called.

"Who is it?" she asked.

"It's me—Atwood—down to the foot of the hill, yer know. Wife was sick and I had to go fer the doctor. Be ye snowed in?"

"Yes. Will you get someone to dig us out some time to-day?"

"All right. I'll git Sam, if he'll come. Be back in an hour or two."

Miss Nancy sat down and waited. The wood was almost gone and she was glad Mr. Atwood had discovered their predicament.

The clock has just struck when she heard a shovel strike the house.

"We're here, Nancy—be out in a shake," said Mr. Atwood.

"All right," she answered, and went into the bed-room to tell Abby.

But her sister was sleeping quietly, so she tiptoed back again.

After an hour's hard shoveling the door opened, and in the gray light of the morning she saw Jim Wilmot standing before her. Mr. Atwood, after assuring himself that everything was safe, went around to the drifts before the windows and commenced work again, but Jim did not go.

"Nancy," he said, "I was a fool the other day. I'm going to sell my farm and come back here. I can't live with out you. Nancy, will you marry me?"

"And Abby?" she questioned.

"Abby shall live with us. You shan't be separated."

"But it's so 'humdrum' here, Jim, and you'll be homesick after the West again," protested Miss Nancy.

"P'raps so, a little," he admitted. "But I must have you, Nancy. Will you forget what I said the other day an' marry me?"

"You know I will, Jim," she said in a whisper, and he kissed her fondly.

And in the bed-room Miss Abby lay asleep, a sweet peace upon her wrinkled face. "She had gone beyond the shadows into the reality."—Waverly Magazine.

Highest Observatory in the World.

The highest permanent astronomical observatory in the world—on the summit of Mont Blanc—was fully equipped with instruments a short time ago. There has been a temporary station there for some years, but the instruments have been small and of little power compared with those now in place.

The establishment of this observatory was a task which at the outset seemed impossible, and the obstacles which M. Jansen, who headed the quartet of French astronomers, had to overcome were unparalleled. Mont Blanc is nearly sixteen thousand feet high, and its ascent, even under the most favorable conditions during the summer months, is difficult as well as dangerous.

The transportation of many heavy and delicate scientific instruments to the top of this loftiest mountain of the Alps was, therefore, a labor so great as to seem beyond the range of possibility, yet it was accomplished without the loss of a single life. The telescope and the other instruments had to be taken to pieces before being carried up the precipitous mountain sides; even then some of the packages weighed a hundred pounds, and most of them about fifty. One of the guides who assisted in the work holds the record of having made the ascent more than five hundred times since the beginning of his professional career, and it was he who found recently the bodies of the Austrian professor and his two guides who lost their lives not long ago.

A Chinese Dinner Party.

When a Chinese minister at Washington gives a formal dinner to any of his countrymen of sufficient rank to be thus honored, or to Japanese visitors, he never fails to go through a curious form of etiquette.

Before taking his seat at the head of the board he approaches the guests, who stand in a line round the table, and without uttering a syllable pushes each tenderly and playfully and points significantly to the unoccupied post at the head of the table.

It is etiquette for the guests to observe a rigid demeanor, neither speaking nor moving, and demonstrating by their inflexible attitudes their unworthiness to occupy the place of honor.

This over, the minister sinks into his chair, and no doubt would have been greatly surprised had anybody taken it. No one speaks until the minister drops a remark, which is finally taken up and commented upon. Then the chief speaks again, and more observations follow. So it may be said that the chairman, in a measure, supplies subjects for conversation.

Another curious custom at these formal dinners is that after the fish is eaten the guests all rise simultaneously and dust their chairs with their napkins.

The bill of fare is pretty nearly the same as would be served at any other foreign legation, with one or two special Chinese delicacies only.

Saved by His Wit.

If a man is going to play the bully he ought to have good muscles or a clever wit. A little adventure into which one such braggart stumbled is thus narrated by an exchange. He was a smallish man with a large voice.

He had a companion who, be it said, to his credit, seemed ashamed of the company he was in, stood in a hotel rotunda one Saturday night. The little fellow was talking about Ireland, and he said many hard things concerning the country and the people.

A big man stood by listening to the little fellow's vaporings. He merely smiled until the little fellow said in a very loud tone:

"Show me an Irishman and I'll show you a coward."

Then the big fellow slipped up, and touched the little fellow on the shoulder, saying in a heavy bass voice:

"What's that you said?"

"I said 'Show me an Irishman and I'll show you a coward,' said the little fellow, whose knees were shaking under him.

"Well, I'm an Irishman," said the big fellow.

"You are an Irishman? Well," and a smile of joy flitted over the little fellow's countenance as he saw a hole through which he could crawl, "I'm a coward."

A REMARKABLE CASE.

Mrs. Mary Noren, Wife of a Well-Known Farmer Near Valparaiso, Brought Back to Health and Strength by a Popular Remedy—Her Statement of the Cure.

From the Star, Valparaiso, Ind.

The attention of the Star having been called to several cases of radical cures effected by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, it was determined to investigate some of the more notable of these cases, with a view to disseminating exact information on the subject and benefiting others who were suffering. Prominent among those who had experienced benefits from the use of this remedy was mentioned Mrs. Mary Noren, wife of John Noren, a prosperous farmer, living northeast of Valparaiso, Ind., and to her a reporter was accordingly dispatched.

Mrs. Noren was found busily engaged in household duties, but she found time to detail her experience, and was willing and even anxious that the benefits she had felt should be told for the benefit of those who had suffered as she did

"I had been ill since girlhood with a complication of complaints," said Mrs. Noren, "never so much as to be confined long in bed, but I suffered intense misery. My chief trouble was with my stomach. I felt a constant gnawing pain that was at times almost distracting and which had been diagnosed by different physicians as dyspepsia and sympathetic derangement dependent on the condition of the generative organs—I had pains in the back, sometimes so great as to make me unable to work, and frequent bilious attacks. I also suffered greatly from constipation, from which I never could find permanent relief. Then these symptoms were aggravated by rheumatic pains between the shoulder blades, which were most excruciating in damp or cold weather. After my marriage, about five years ago, and when my baby was born, the trouble seemed to increase, and I was frequently so sick that I could not do my household work. I tried different physicians and used numerous remedies, but all in vain, until one day last fall I happened to read of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. My husband got three boxes from Mr. C. D. Rushton, the druggist, and I began to use them. From the first I began to feel relief and before three boxes were gone I was nearly well. The constipation was cured and the other troubles were so much relieved that I felt better than I had felt for years. As I continued in the use of the pills I grew better and strong, my appetite was more natural, and my flesh increased until I am in the condition you see me now."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effect of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, all forms of weakness, either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 (they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

Reforms Need More than a Day

To bring them about, and are always more complete and lasting when they proceed with steady regularity to a consummation. Few of the observant among us can have failed to notice that permanently healthful changes in the human system are not wrought by abrupt and violent means, and that those are the most salutary medicines which are progressive. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the chief of these. Dyspepsia, a disease of obstinate character, is obliterated by it.

Too Exact to Lie.

Of an eminent person, whose great subtlety of mind was being discussed, Huxley said that the constant over-refinement of distinctions in his case destroyed all distinctness. Anything could be explained away, and so one thing came to mean the same as its opposite. Some one asked: "Do you mean that he is untruthful?" "No," replied Huxley, "he is not clear-headed enough to tell a lie."

With a sharp stick

you can turn up the dirt and get ground ready for planting—but what a clumsy, slow, laborious, ineffective way of going to work! Not much more so, though, than the old-fashioned way of washing. Think of it! Grinding the clothes up and down on a wash-board, with nothing but soap and main strength to get out the dirt. Then think how simple and easy is Pearline's way—soaking, boiling, rinsing. You need Pearline for all your washing and cleaning. You need something better than soap or a sharp stick when you're dealing with dirt. 518

Our Assertions Proven.

That The Dispatch Has Published A Falsehood is Proven by The Following.

It affords Mr. Lochner of this paper great pleasure to present its readers with such good and substantial proof as the New York World in referring to our article concerning a trip to Canton to visit Major McKinley. We then stated that the Associated Press dispatches were not wholly reliable, as too often their reports were exaggerated, and among other subjects mentioned we said that "Major McKinley reads his speeches from type written manuscript." But the Dispatch, whose reputation for falsehoods excells that of the Associated Press reports, for whole cloth lies, comes out in a half column article and denies all of our assertions. The editor of the Dispatch, nor any one connected with the concern, has visited Canton this year, and when we told Editor Weamer on the street that he was mistaken and McKinley did read his speech, he said, "Well, well, I'VE BEEN TOLD that he carried a paper on which were a few notes jotted down, simply to refresh his memory." That's reliable isn't it? We stood shoulder to shoulder with Major McKinley, on the porch of the rented property which he occupies, and saw in typewritten manscript identical words that he was delivering to the small audience.

Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Lease, of Kansas, a lady who has been associated with the Governor of her state as member of the state board of agriculture, was sent to Canton to pay Major McKinley a visit in the interest of the New York Sunday World. She says in regard to Mr. McKinley and his speeches:

"Major McKinley is a living example of discription of self. Conditions have brought him into contact and made him dependent upon others. A lack of self-confidence marks the man. You do not need to ask him questions to know that he is a stultification. "I refuse to be put on record," is in his manner and lurks in his eyes. Looking at him, one can say with Emerson. "Be still, for what you are stands over you and speaks so loudly I cannot hear what you say." HIS SPEECHES ARE READ FROM MANSCRIPT. His every public utterance is prepared. He does not dare trust himself, for he has not been true to himself. He is on record. As a candidate for the Presidency on a platform which his past career and his every public utterance in the past have repudiated. Major McKinley has closed eye and ear to the needs of the people, and standing as did Pontius Pilate before the multitude, he "washes his hands of the blood of the Just One.

Major McKinley is the most colossal example of moral turpitude and political cowardice the age has known."

We also mentioned something about the crowds at Canton and on a later date published a facimile of the letter sent out by the Traveling Men's Association. Mrs. Lease says.

"Telegraphing the day before starting for Pullman accommodations, lest I should find a great crowd of pilgrims seeking the McKinley shrine, I was surprised to find less than a half dozen passengers for Canton, no evidence of any multitude in the city and at the McKinley residence but three or four gentlemen.

A number of visiting delgates, whose legitimate railroad fares would have been $10, told me that the round trip for the party was only 75 cents each, and return tickets to Chicago for 25 cents were plentiful in Canton the day the Traveling Men's Association visited McKinley.

Canton is gay with flags, McKinley pictures are displayed everywhere, but more than 2,000 enrolled voters in the Bryan Free-Silver Club indicates that much wrong may triumph for a time, right will ultimately prevail. God's truth goes marching on."

Out of Place.

We sre sorry to have to criticise anything the old veterans do, but when they turn a reunion into a political machine, we cannot agree with them in that. It is all right on most occasions to take a "straw vote," but not at a "non-partisan" soldiers reunion. This time when they registered they were passed to another man, who asked each how he was going to vote. This was an insult to every true soldier and many resented it. It was a disgrace to those who did it. The veteran has earned a right to vote as he pleases without question from any party, democratic or republican. Another thing was altogether out of place. The republicans in the drum corps that led the march to the trains, wore McKinley hats. We would criticise this as severely had they worn Bryan hats. There is a decency and fitness, possible in all things, but this was neither. We shall be sorry to see these reunions dragged into politics. So far democrats have done a good share to sustain them but if they are to be merely a republican annex, this will cease. At St. Joe we are pleased to say, the old 44th held a veterans' reunion.

Growing Children

One-third of all the children die before they are five years old. Most of them die of some wasting disease. They grow very slowly; keep thin in flesh; are fretful; food does not do them much good. You can't say they have any disease, yet they never prosper. A slight cold, or some stomach and bowel trouble takes them away easily.

SCOTT'S EMULSION of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites is just the remedy for growing children. It makes hard flesh; sound flesh; not soft, flabby fat. It makes strong bones, healthy nerves. It changes poor children to children rich in prosperity.

A Corker.

YES, IT WAS MORE THAN A CORKER.

The President and Vice-President of the Jefferson Township McKinley Club. Out for Bryan

(Columbia City Post)

Jefferson township was shaken from center to circumference Tuesday night. N. F. Watson and M. A. Gillespie discussed the money question at the center school house and the debate attracted a tremendous crowd.

Watson is a gold standard man and a republican. Gillespie is a free silver republican. The former had the opening and closing. He had his speech in manuscript and did not succeed in getting through with it in the hour he was alloted, but Mr. Gillespie kindly permitted him to take as much time as he desired.

Mr. Watson's speech was rather coolly received, although the audience gave him a respectful and attentive hearing.

Mr. Gillespie spoke without notes. He soon captured the crowd by the skillful and complete manner in which he demolished the arguments of his opponent. Cheer after cheer followed his well delivered blows and at times the enthusiasm became so great that the speaker was obliged to wait several minutes until order was restored. Those present say that Mr. Gillespie's arguments were unanswerable and so well backed up with facts that those whose partisan spirit has blinded them for years could not escape seeing the shining truths he presented.

Watson attempted to reply in his fifteen minutes, but failed utterly to make any impression upon the crowd which had been almost completely captured by his brilliant opponent.

But the greatest sensation of the evening was to follow.

Harvey Robinett, who was brought up in the republican faith, and who presided over the meeting and who is also the president of the McKinley club of Jefferson township, stepped out of the chair to one side and said in substance:

Ladies and gentlemen: I am not going to make a speech, but I wish to say that I am for Bryan and Sewall from top to bottom and from bottom to top, and I will vote that ticket. Nothing can change me and I want that understood.

What a scene followed! Bryan men shook the building with cheers; the air was full of hats and caps and handkerchiefs and dozens of republicans rushed forward and taking him by the hand congratulated him. For ten minutes the jubilee continued. It was a corker. The golden tongued orator of the evening and his few followers wilted like plucked weeds and hurried away from the scene.

The club was feeling blue ovor the desertion of their vice-president. Ora Bayless, who came out for free silver a couple weeks ago, and now to lose the president, filled them with consternation.

The Jefferson township boys say that a few more joint debates will only add to the splendid victory to be scored in November. They are naturally jubilant and enthusiastic over the progress they are making and propose to keep up the good work until the end of the great battle.

The Railroads.

In addition to what we say in another article about railroads. We wish to add some republican testimony in the subject Won. E. Curtis, republican writer for the Chicago Record writes yesterday from Virginia on the prospect of carrying that state for McKinley. This he believes will be done and among other reasons Why the republicans will succeed in not only Virginia, but other states he says:

Another important point is that for the first time in history all the railways are openly working for the republican candidates. Hitherto the management of the railway have been democratic, personally, and because of the many local inducements that have led them to assist that party. But this fall the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Norfolk & Western and the Southern, which are the great trunk lines, representing upward of 50,000 voters, have notified their men that Bryan's election will be their ruin and McKinley's their salvation, and that they expect every one of their employes to protect their interests at the polls. Some of the railway managers, like President Ingalls of the Chesapeake & Ohio, have taken the stump and addressed meetings of their employes, explaining the reasons why the adoption of a silver standard injure the railways more than other interests. All of them have distributed republican campaign literature among their men by the carload, and there is not a man upon the pay rolls of any of the roads in Virginia who does not understand fully why his employers ask him to vote for McKinley. Many of them will not do so. Some wear Bryan badges and defy their employers. Others, who wear McKinley badges and belong to McKinley clubs, will vote for Bryan. As one brakeman expressed it. "Yes I wear a McKinley badge. The boss gave it to me, and I wear it to please him, but I don't vote with my shoulder, not to please any one but myself."

A Prominent Lawyer,

Of Greenville, Ill., Mr. C. E. Cook, writes, "I have been troubled with biliousness, sick headache, sour stomach constipation, etc., for several years. I sought long and tried many remedies, but was disappointed until I tried your Syrup Pepsin. I can cheerfully recommend it to any suffering from above complaints." Sold by F. E. Davenport.

Obituary.

Amanda S. Beard was born in Stark Co. O. March 2d, 1825, died in DeKalb Co. Ind. Oct. 13th 1896, aged 71 years. 7 months and 11 days.

At the age of fourteen she removed with her parents to Hamilton Ind., where they resided for two years, when they moved upon their farm near Taylors corners in DeKalb Co. At the age of 23, Oct. 25th 1848 she was married to Orrin Keep and went immediately to their farm house where they have resided ever since. Thus for forty-eight years the worthy pair delved and strove, enjoyed and dispensed hospitalities. Had their hopes and fears together. She was of a family of six, Jefferson Beard and Mrs. Miles Waterman surviving. She had one child Prof. H. H. Keep of the Waterloo schools, who with his faithful old father were untiring in their efforts to comfort and help the dear old wife and mother in her long and distressing illness. Miss May, a daughter of Jefferson Beard who had resided with her for years and was like a daughter aided and supported her to the last with a beautiful devotion.

Religiously, she was a firm believer and faithful student of the Holy Bible with preferences to the Christian church. Her obsequies were had at the home and were largely attended. Interment at the Hamilton cemetery.

The Wonderful Churn.

I want to add my testimony to the list of those that have used the Lightning Churn. It does all that is claimed of it; you can churn easily in one minute and get a large percentage more butter than with the common churns. I never took the agency for anything before, but so many of my neighbors wanted churns that I ordered 30 and they are all gone. I think in a year nearly every farmer will have a Lightning Churn, in fact they can't afford to be without one as they make so much more butter, and a good little bit of money can be made in every township selling these churns. By writing to J. F. Casey & Co., St. Louis, Mo., you can get circulars and full particulars about the churn A READER. 3

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa., and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf

English View

The Financial News, published in London, and the leading financial paper of that country throws some light on the interest the English take in keeping the United States on a gold basis. The following is in its issue of June 19, 1894:

"Seldom have the points which have most need to borne in mind in the silver controversy been put with more force and lucidity than by Sir David Barbour in his recent address at Drapers' hall. The address bore mainly on the Indian aspect of the question, and in regard to it Sir David spoke with greater freedom than on any former occasion since he left Indian. But the general question is of more moment than its Indian aspect, and on it Sir David Barbour made some weighty comments. He reviewed the position strictly from the point of view of accomplished facts, or facts in a course of accomplishment. The Exclusion of silver from monetary use goes on from year to year. Europe long ago declared against the white metal, the United States and India virtually did so last year. Now even the smaller and more remote states of the world are talking of gold standards. Chili anticipates the resumption of metallic currency or its equivalent, but on a gold and not a silver basis. Ecuador is credited with a similar desire, and Costa Rica has discussed the possibility. It is the fashion of the day, and it seems to be spreading, but it cannot go on forever. Even those who conceive that all possible perfection resides in a single gold standard admit that it is neither possible nor desirable to shut silver out altogether as a standard monetary metal. But where is the line to be drawn? At what stage, and in what way, asks Sir David Barbour, is it practicable to stop the process of exclusion? The more silver is boycotted the stronger becomes the tendency and the temptation to boycott it.

"The only suggestion that is put forward by the anti-silver men is that gold should be the standard of rich countries and silver that of poor ones. As Sir David Barbour paints out there is a primary difficulty in classifying countries on this singular principle. As a matter of fact many silver countries are rich. We should not be prepared to relegate India to the category of poor countries, through the average wealth of the inhabitants is meager and the sources of revenue few and not prolific. A country is not poor which has, by increased production, borne without breaking, the heavy burden thrown on its revenue through the virtual doubling of the cost of its gold debt. Mexico might have remained poor in every sense of the term had not the fall in exchange compelled her to test her reserve wealth and strive to realize it. You cannot force a solvent country to plead guilty to poverty, and submit to be permanently classed as a mere stepchild in the family of nations.

"With the markets of the avowed silver countries gradually closing against us, the trade outlook is not bright, and if we were to be put to further disadvantage in the United States, as compared with other competitors, the prospect would be grave indeed. As a matter of fact, we do not need to take possible action of this nature into consideration in pressing on the government the necessity of doing something—if it were only to show a conciliatory disposition—to put and end to a situation that daily grows more intolerable, and threatens to destroy our commercial supremacy, not to speak of our character for financial foresight."

Mexican Mone.

This is still the cry with republican speakers. But a person not ignorant or not intending to deceive would state the whole truth, which is, that all coins, all over the world, have their legal money value in their own home country, and only their bullion value outside of it. A gold dollar or a silver dollar of Mexicao is neither one a legal tender in any other country. Neither is the gold sovereign or silver shilling of England, nor the gold dollar or silver dollar of the United States. A coin outside its own country is merely bullion and sells for the value of the metal. An American dollar could not be used in Mexico to pay debts at more than 53 cents. In our own country, our director of the mint fixes the value of all foreign coins every three months, and this value is certified to and pulished by the secretary of the treasury. The only thing that would enable a Mexican to take our dollars at 100 cents gold value, would be that he knew where he could get them returned to our side of the line. He could pass it on the Mexican government for only its bullion value. In 1892 the Mexican silver dollar was reckoned at our mint at 66 cents and their gold dollar at 98 cents, both being the value of the metal.

Ready To Shoot.

There is a well founded rumor that the republicans have got Rus Guilford's cannon and repaired it, bought their powder and laid their plans to celebrate McKinley's election. We are also told that the plan is to fire it off in front of each democratic home in Auburn. If the very unlikely event of Bryan's defeat should happen, we shall not object to the cannon, but we don't want eggs thrown against our door as they did in 1888. But our own opinion is, it will be the Bryan men who will celebrate.

W. J. Bryan.

A great many citizens, including men of all parties went to Ft. Wayne to-day to hear and see Bryan the democratic nominee for president. No matter what party a man is of, he cannot help admiring the man who is making the greatest struggle a man ever made, even for this highest honor in the world. No man ever flew back and forth, around and across this great country in such an earnest and tireless way, making speeches night and day, without rest, without a thought of staying his grand career till the polls close on election day. No one doubts that such a man is in earnest or that he believes it is his destiny to do service to his fellow men. Such a man should succeed, because he earns and deserves success. We do not believe he will fail. But should this be his fate, he will still be a figure the most heroic, the most sublime, that our times have seen.

Political Notes.

At a recent sermon in Chicago, Rev. Gunsaulus, now a rampant gold advocate, took for his text, "The gold and the silver are mine, saith the Lord, and the half shekel shall be as the shekel in the sanctuary." To a democrat this goes right contrary to the belief of republicans.

It looks sad to see so many good republicans calling that "unsound and dishonest money" for which McKinley Garfield, Lincoln, Grant and their other leaders spoke such burning words. Why there is a big flag stretched across the street here, that discredits all these good men ever said on the silver question.

There is the usual amount of good jokes this campaign. It is said that Mr. Hartman, when speaking at Garrett, got so interested that he did not notice he had walked off the stage and onto the piano that sits right in front of it. The audience noticed it.

Some of our business houses have made themselves so offensive to certain customers, as to lose them. They don't like to be talked to death on politics they already understand as well or better than the man they have just paid their money to. Then they declare a boycott. But this is nomore justifiable than the little boycott a few narrow minded ones have declared on the COURIER. Both are unwise.

Republicans are whistling to keep up courage. But they are beginning to see the handwriting on the wall.

Traveling men are about two to one for McKinley, because their employers are. Two or three of these made assertions here in Auburn that "farmers did not understand the political question, because few of them took papers, and fewer read them." These traveling men would learn their mistake if they should tackle a farmer. It would turn out like the Welsheimer discussion down in Jackson township.

Saturday's Daily.

To-day the democrats of Garrett had two speakers who were to discuss political issues for the better understanding of employes. But the republicans hustled about and got up a free excursion to Chicago so as to keep all the men possible, from hearing the truth. All were given the long ride and a free visit to the big city for nothing. And some former democrats of Auburn were assisting in this questionable business. A party that stoops to practices like this, must not expect the common people to have any faith in it. They are getting scared.

The call circulated lately by republican workers, to have "speakers of national reputation" come up here and help save DeKalb county from its farmer orators seems to have had its effect. Since then we have had Foulke, Dolliver, Pomeroy, Welsheimer, and McBride, and now we are to have Lew Wallace and Ben. Harrison. In other words we are to have "Ben. Hur" and "Ben" here.

It is said that yesterday, Hon. S. S. Shutt asked Hon. E. D. Hartman to meet him and have a joint discussion, but the offer was declined.

The U. S. Marshal for Kansas, has ordered people not to use national flags to hang political banners and mottoes on. He says there is a U. S. statute that forbids it.

—W. D. Bynum who is now leading the gold democrats into the McKinley camp, has always been an extreme free silver man, as many votes and speeches in congress prove. But since he was defeated for congress two years ago, he has asked Cleveland for various offices, but could not succeed, as Cleveland believes him to be two-faced. So now he is advocating gold, and trying to defeat the party that made him all he ever was or ever will be.

Mr. Moody reports excellent meetings, that he has been holding with Mr. Deindorffer, in the north of the county.

Courage Failed.

With Welsheimer's late experience in Jackson Township with a free silver farmer, Mr. Pomeroy grew faint hearted and failed to go to Waterloo last evening. He had made up a joint debate with Tom Kelly, and agreed to all points for the meeting, as can be proved by Will Francis and Phil Plum. The hall was well lighted, was full of people, and Tom was on hand. But they waited in vain. No Pomeroy came. And now he says he got word from there not to go. It was probably a case of heart failure.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. JOHN G. N. tf

Horrible! Horrible!

Innocent children by the thousand are constantly dying of diarrhœa whose life might be saved. How quickly the demon works! Flesh speedily wastes away as though subjected to fire. You try change of water, and change of food and change of air. The handiest and quickest and safest thing you can do is to procure at once a bottle of Dr. Hand's Diarrhœa Mixture, at any drug store, for 25c. It's wonderful how quickly it brings good results. Fischler & Son.

Part Hickory.

Saturday's Daily.

We recently said there was but little pole raising this campaign. We had not heard from Ashley then. Last Saturday, the republicans attempted to raise an ash pole, but the crowd was not large enough to put it up and the job was put off till Wednesday of this week. But on trying it again, it broke in two and they had to put it off till to-day. And now in order to get the silver men to help them they had to put in a middle section of hickory. So the pole goes up part ash and part hickory and democrats have to furnish the muscle. Republicans seem to lack backbone this year.

Big Train.

Wednesday's Daily.

The number of tickets sold for the Bryan meeting from Auburn, were 291 on the morning train, and 76 on the afternoon train. And a great many drove down, especially from parts of the county south of Auburn. The forenoon train had 13 coaches and when they reached Ft. Wayne, had on 993 passengers.

That Postal Vote.

We have already alluded to the postal card vote now being taken by the Chicago Record. From all we can hear the democrats are not voting in most states and cities. This is shown in almost every case. Take our own state where no one denies but there are about as many democrats as republicans, the total postal vote sent in so far, is democrats, 4,420; republicans, 10,590. The latter is more than double the former, which all know is impossible.

Then take our own county of DeKalb which has sent, democratic votes 62; republican votes 134, or more than double, which every citizen knows cannot be. So we say this proves democrats are not voting and we have received letters from the towns of this county that such is the case.

BRYAN GAINS MOST.

But to show how the parties are likely to stand, we have only to look at Bryan's gains and McKinley's. The vote in Indiana shows that Bryan has received 954 votes of former republicans, and that McKinley has received 624 votes of former democrats. Comparing Bryan's gain with his total vote, we find he has gained 1 from the republicans in every 4⅓ votes received On the other hand looking at McKinley's total of 10,590, and his gain from the democrats of 624, it will be seen that he gains only 1 in 17. This shows that Bryan has gained in Indiana nearly 4 times as many republicans as McKinley has gained democrats.

Illinois sends 5,400 postals for Bryan and 15,336 for McKinley. Bryan gains 647 from the republicans, gaining 1 in 5. McKinley 1,134 which is only 1 in 13⅓. That is Bryan has gained 2½ times as many republicans as McKinley has democrats.

In Michigan, Bryan has got 2,511 votes; McKinley 7,879. Bryan has gained from the republicans, 613, or 1 vote in 4. McKinley has gained from the democrats, 800, or only 1 in 8⅓. That is, Bryan has gained in Michigan more than 2 to 1 over McKinley.

Wisconsin shows, Bryan 1,628; McKinley, 7,572; Bryan gains 393, or 1 in 4. McKinley gains 900, or 1 in 8, and this shows that Bryan gains twice as much as McKinley.

Minnesota gives Bryan 1,211 postals, and McKinley, 4,270. Bryan gains from the republicans, 358, or 1 to 3⅓. McKinley gains 456, or 1 in 9. That is, Bryan gains in Minnesota, almost 3 times as fast as McKinley does.

From these results, which are taken from the Chicago Record of Oct. 21, it will be seen that if these gains are true, as the Record claims, all of these great central states will go for Bryan. If the Record's published postal votes are not true, then republicans might as well stop bragging over it.

MARRIED.

Tuesday, Oct. 21, 1896, G. A. Mead and Mrs. Sarah A. Cass were quietly married at the home of the latter on North Main St. in this city. Rev. W. L. Meese officiated at the ceremony. Both the contracting parties are old and well known citizens and the COURIER unites with their many friends in wishing them all possible happiness.

Tuesday, Oct. 21, 1896 occurred the marriage of Henry W. Miser, of this place, and Miss Belle Milton, of St. Joe. The groom is a member of the firm of Miser Brothers, bakers on West Seventh street, and the bride is a daughter of Henry Milton, of Concord. She has been in Auburn, however, for some time, and is well known to our younger people. Both are popular and we wish them a long and happy married life. They come to Auburn to-day to settle down and make this place their home. The officiating minister, was Rev. Mr. Evans.

CRISP IS DEAD!

In the Midst of Political Strife the Country Is Shocked by the Death of a Great Statesman.

Atlanta (Ga.) special: Charles F. Crisp, ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives, died here Friday afternoon.

The end came at a quarter to 2 o'clock. Mr. Crisp had been an inmate of the sanitarium of Dr. J. B. S. Holmes of this city for several weeks. His condition had been reported as very low, but no fatal conclusion to his illness had been expected so soon. When a rumor got abroad several days ago that he was sinking it was vigorously denied in the sanitarium, where it was given out that he was getting better. He was suffering from malarial fever. The immediate cause of his death was heart failure.

Mr. Crisp was the choice of the Democrats of Georgia to succeed John B. Gordon in the United States Senate and would have been chosen to that position by the Legislature at its approaching session had he lived. His untimely death throws the political situation into chaos and makes the choice of Senator a matter of great uncertainty.

Crushed by a Bookcase.

Two-year-old Catherine Simon, daughter of the Rev. E. W. Simon, pastor of the First Lutheran Church of Springfield, Ohio, was killed. Rev. M. Simon was stooping in front of the bookcase in the sitting room to procure a book, when the bookcase, which is about eight feet high and filled with books, toppled over, striking the minister and then fell onto the little girl, who was prattling away behind her father. It is supposed the top of the bookcase struck the child on the head, for her skull was crushed. She died in three hours.

Tragedy in Police Court.

In the lobby of the Police Court at Sacramento, Cal., the other morning, James Lowe shot and fatally wounded Addie Schilling, and then blew his own brains out. The woman was to have been a witness against him in a vagrancy case. Lowe was the son of State Senator Lowe of San Jose. When shot, the Schilling woman had in her hand threatening letters written her by Lowe, who was suspected of arson.

Burglars Caught.

The Police Department at Fort Wayne, Ind., have in custody three men, who are evidently burglars. They were arrested on suspicion, and a quantity of pocket knives, razors and revolvers found in their possession. They have probably robbed some country store, the location of which the police are unable to find. They will be held until the 25th, under the vagrant law.

Demand Immediate Release.

The Marquis of Salisbury has demanded the immediate release of Sun Yat Sen, the Chinese physician, said to be a British subject, who was, according to the statement of his friends, kidnapped while passing the Chinese legation in London, and who is held a prisoner in the legation on the charge of having been engaged in a conspiracy to overthrow the Manchu dynasty.

Corn-Cob Pipe Inventor Dead.

Henry Tibbe, a wealthy citizen of Washington, Mo., aged 77 years, is dead at his home, of pneumonia. He was born at Enschede, Holland, and emigrated to this country in 1867. He was the inventor and patentee of the now world-famous corn-cob pipe, manufactured at his home.

Broke Jail.

Nine prisoners confined in the United States jail at Fort Smith, Ark., succeeded in making their escape and have not yet been recaptured. They tunnelled into the cells where two boys of the Correta train robbers, who, in attempting to escape, had made a hole to the roof recently, and let themselves down with ropes.

JUDGE RICHARDSON DIES.

Head of the Court of Claims Expires at Washington.

William A. Richardson, chief justice of the Court of Claims, died at his home in Washington, aged 74 years. He had been ill for some months with a complication of diseases, and owing to his advanced age his death had been generally expected. Judge Richardson was born at Tyngsborough, Mass, in 1821, and was a graduate of the law department of Harvard in 1846, was judge advocate and general's aid in Massachusetts, and was president of the common council of Lowell in 1853-54. He became judge of probate in 1856, and was judge of probate and insolvency from 1858 to 1872. The judge declined a Superior court judgeship in 1869 and the same year became assistant secretary of the United States treasury. He went to Europe as the financial agent of the government in 1871 to negotiate for the sale of the funded loan of the United States and made the first contract abroad for the sale of the bonds. In 1873 he became Secretary of the Treasury, resigning in 1874 to accept a seat on the bench of the Court of Claims, of which he became chief justice in 1885. This position he held at the time of his death. Judge Richardson was the author of a number of publications of a financial and legal character.

KRUPP IS IN IT.

Gun-Maker's Company Loans Venezuela $10,000,000.

Advices received by Minister Andrade of Venezuela are to the effect that the commission sent by Venezuela to Germany has returned after accomplishing most satisfactory arrangements which bring about a close identity of interests between the two countries. The main features of the arrangement are a loan of 50,000,000 bolivars, or $10,000,000, of German capital to the Venezuelan Government and the establishment of a German bank with large capital at Caracas. The large loan comes from private German sources, but it is felt to be not the less important in showing the sentiment of the German Government toward Venezuela. The commission was headed by the Minister of Public Works in President Crespo's Cabinet. On reaching Berlin the members were received with marked honors by Emperor William, who conferred decorations upon them. Heretofore English capital has built the docks at Laguayra and carried forward other enterprises. It is pointed out also that the security and responsibility of Venezuela are strongly attested when German capitalists, who are careful and conservative, make such heavy investments there.

NOW SAFE FROM ARREST.

Rudolph Schnaubelt, Chicago's Famous Fugitive Anarchist, Dies of Consumption.

Rudolph Schnaubelt, the supposed bomb-thrower of the Chicago Haymarket riot, is dead at last. It is the third report of his death, but this time it is definite. His life came to an end Monday in San Bernardino, Cal., consumption being the cause. In 1887 he was reported dead in Erie, Pa., and only eighteen months ago a report came that he was fatally shot in Honduras. Schnaubelt was one of the first men arrested with Lingg, Spies, and Schwab, May 5, 1886, after the great riot. For ten hours the police kept him in the sweat box, but his nerves stood the test and they let him go. He took immediate advantage of this, for he disappeared as completely as if he had dropped into the lake. In ten hours more the police wanted him badly, but could not trace him. He was reported in Central America and all over the world, but was never captured.

DARING MAIL ROBBER.

Dons a Postal Uniform and Boldly Walks Off with a Letter Pouch.

A daring mail robber has been arrested in Kansas City by the postal authorities. The culprit is C. H. Hamilton, alias Wallace. The other evening Hamilton appeared at the Union depot, wearing the brass buttons and uniform of a railway mail agent. He stepped boldly up to a truck that was standing under the depot sheds loaded with mail sacks, and pulling down a letter-pouch threw it across his arm and stepped into a waiting-room. There he placed the pouch under an overcoat that hung upon his arm and walked into the street, not knowing that he had been "shadowed." He was arrested at his hotel while going through the letters. He had already extracted several small sums of money.

GRAND TRAVERSE RUN DOWN.

Collided with the Livingstone Near Colchester Light and Went Down.

The steamer Grand Traverse of the Lackawanna line and the steamer Livingstone collided near Colchester Light, off Amherstburg, Ont. The Grand Traverse sank immediately, the crew being taken off by the Livingstone. The Grand Traverse, after being laid up most of the season, went into commission at noon Sunday, and had not been in service twenty-four hours before she was sunk. The Livingstone had been out of commission but was loaded with grain at Armour's Friday. The Grand Traverse was insured for $25,000. She was built in 1879, and measured 869 tons. She belongs to a class of vessels now out of date for money-making, and her owners will not suffer much if any loss.

Van's Fearful Misery.

A Berlin dispatch to the London Daily News says: The St. Petersburg Viedomosti gives details of the Van massacre secured from fugitives who have arrived at Eichmiadzin. They declare that no Armenians are left in the Van district. The Kurds, declaring that they were executing the Sultan's will, mercilessly butchered the men, kidnaped the prettiest women and girls, and threw the children into the pits intended for storing corn and buried them alive, in order to save ammunition. The adult victims were arranged in rows and were killed, two or three at a single shot. The details of the outrages on the priests and temples and the sacred books and vessels are indescribably revolting.

May Result in a Race War.

A white man named J. H. Rook was shot and killed by a negro near Sunnyside, Leflore County, Mississippi. Mr. Rook, so far as is known, was reprimanding a colored woman at her home when the man interfered and the shooting began, the negro being in the house and Mr. Rook on the outside. Rook was shot down and killed. At night a posse took the negro and hanged him. The following day a man in Greenwood received a telegram from another man near Sunnyside saying he had received a letter from a negro living near there containing information that the negroes had challenged the whites to a riot. Such was the nature of the telegram that a number of white men left part of the county.

Another Vanderbilt Weds.

Miss Edith Shepard, second daughter of Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard and granddaughter of the late William H. Vanderbilt, was married at Scarborough, Westchester County, N. Y., to Ernesto Fabbri. The ceremony took place in the Shepard Memorial chapel.

Murdered by Wild Men.

Details of a massacre on the Solomon Islands were brought to San Francisco from the South Seas by the Oceanic Steamship Company's mail steamer Monowai, which arrived from Australia, via the Sandwich Islands, Thursday. The victims of the bloodthirsty savages were members of a party of Austrians, which had been taken to the islands by the Austrian man-of-war Albatross. It was under the leadership of Henry Baron Foulton von Norbeck, an Austrian scientist, who has visited many groups of islands in the South Seas and had numerous exciting experiences with the natives. While traveling with an armed guard over the mountains of the island he was set upon by bushmen and slain, together with three others. During the desperate conflict which followed the assault many of the party were dangerously wounded. The Albatross was commissioned by the Austrian Government to make a scientific exploration on Solomon Islands.

HEROIC FIGHT.

White Floridan with a Rifle Stands Off Negroes.

Besieged by infuriated negroes, J. M. Criglar, manager of Hagerman's lumber mills at Hager Station, four miles west of Chipley, Fla., defended himself with such effect that he killed two of his assailants and wounded four others. Criglar became engaged in a quarrel with one of his employes, and the other negroes drew pistols and began firing at the manager. Criglar ran to his office, locked himself in and opened fire with a Winchester on the maddened negroes, who surrounded the building. For an hour the battle continued, and when the Louisville and Nashville train arrived at the station the negroes were preparing to set fire to the building and cremate Criglar. The train crew and passengers, however, rushed to the latter's aid and dispersed the negroes. The negroes had fired over 200 bullets into the building, but Crigler escaped by lying on the floor. As soon as the negroes fired a volley, however, he would rise and shoot at them through the windows.

CAUGHT THE DAUNTLESS

Raleigh Surprised the Filibuster Taking Coal from the Mabey.

The United States cruiser Raleigh discovered the steamer Dauntless taking a cargo of coal from the steamer R. L. Mabey off Mosquito Inlet. As the warship bore down on them the filibusters started in opposite directions, and the Raleigh opened fire, dropping solid shot across their bows as a signal to stop. The shot came near striking the vessels. The Dauntless heaved to, but the Mabey ran into Mosquito Inlet and anchored opposite New Smyrna. The Raleigh took the Dauntless in tow and sent an officer after the Mabey. The two prizes were towed up the coast to the St. John's bar, and are anchored inside the river, with the cutter Boutwell alongside. The Dauntless had just arrived from the South, and is supposed to have been preparing to carry another expedition to Cuba. The Mabey has been acting as a tender for the filibustering steamers.

CHICAGO'S POLL LIST.

She Is Entitled to the Honor of the Biggest City in America.

Proof of Chicago's supremacy over all other cities in the United States in point of population was recorded Tuesday at the final period for the registration of voters. New York has been left far behind in the race. The difference in the two great centers of population would permit of the addition to the New York registration lists of the total voting strength of any of seven States. New York as it is now constituted claims a total population of 1,750,000, and up to date the best that the political parties and nonpartisan boomers have been able to register is over 54,000 short of the number enrolled in Chicago, including the last day's registration. In three days New York gathered 331,180 names, whereas in two days Chicago accumulated nearly 400,000 names of legal voters.

Dr. Tanner No More.

The second victim of the fire which destroyed the large pottery plant of the Whitmore-Robinson Company at Akron, Ohio, is now known to be Dr. Tanner, whose right name was Francis Harrison, whose name was made famous by a long fast in which he once indulged.

Blew Open the Safe.

Robbers entered the Bank of Cassville, Mo., the other night and blew open the safe, securing the contents. The amount obtained by the robbers was large. The robbery was the work of professionals.

Roof Fell on Them.

At Charlottesville, Va., the asphalt roof of a one-story room used by the University of Virginia fell and caught five workmen, two of whom—Eugene Bunch and George Tucker—were killed.

Kaiser's Good Luck.

Documents recently unearthed in the royal archives at Berlin prove the Emperor to be owner of the Schloss-Platz, Schlossfreiheit, which includes almost the entire Lustgarten.

Stoneware Works Burn.

The stoneware works of Whitmore Robinson & Co., in East Akron, O., were completely destroyed by fire. The loss will be $200,000 and the insurance half as much.

THE CASTLE CASE.

Wealthy San Francisco Merchant and His Wife Accused of Shoplifting.

A case which has attracted international attention is that of Mr. and Mrs. Walter M. Castle, of San Francisco, who have been admitted to $200,000 bail in London to await trial for grand larceny. The Castles, who are wealthy Americans, and move in the best society of the Pacific coast, are accused of shoplifting. Castle is a member of one of the wealthiest firms in San Francisco and a graduate of London University. His wife is one of the society leaders of the Golden Gate, a woman of gentle disposition and highly cultured. They went to Europe this summer and in September arrived in London. They stopped at the Hotel Cecil and their wealth insured them every attention. The couple often went out on shopping expeditions. One day they visited a furrier's shop, and after examining the furs left without making a purchase. After they had gone the shopkeeper missed articles and put detectives on the track. Mr. and Mrs. Castle were followed to their hotel and there arrested. An examination of their trunks, which had been packed ready for sailing, revealed an amazing amount of stuff, the possession of which is beyond any explanation the police can offer, unless it be taken as evidence that Mrs. Castle has a mania for collecting odd trifles. Among the articles were a number of watches, all alike; a plated toast rack that came from the hotel breakfast table; thirteen umbrella heads, and a pair of sheets bearing the mark of a big London hotel. The sable and chinchilla skins missed by the furrier were also found.

After their arrest £2,000,000 sterling was offered as bail, but the authorities refused to release them. The United States embassy interested itself in their behalf, but without avail. They remained in common cells at the jail seven days, when they were arraigned, held for trial and released on $200,000 bail. Charles Matthews, one of the most noted criminal lawyers in England, has been retained to assist in the defense, and influential friends have sprung up all over the kingdom to help save the Castles from further disgrace, but their efforts will hardly avail. Larceny is a felony in English law, the punishment for which is practically unlimited, and the charges against the Castles are so well founded that their legal advisers are in despair. They do not believe that Magistrate Shell will even consent to consider the case under the "first offender's" act, which provides punishment by fine in lieu of imprisonment. Their attorneys admit the thefts, but will set up kleptomania as a defense.

HURL EGGS AT CARLISLE.

Attempt to Silence the Secretary of the Treasury at Covington, Ky.

Secretary of the Treasury John G. Carlisle made the first of his series of Kentucky speeches in Covington Thursday night in Odd Fellows' Hall, which was crowded to its utmost capacity. He was received with hearty applause when he appeared on the stage. This was followed by vociferous cheers for Bryan from 100 men forming a line in the standing room at the rear of the hall. This continued for some time after Secretary Carlisle began to speak, completely drowning his voice, so those nearest him on the stage could not hear his words. At the same time a crowd occupied the street and rent the air with shouts for Bryan. This continued at frequent intervals during the entire speaking. Now and then a man on the outside would shout: "Carlisle, the traitor."

Once after Mr. Carlisle began his speech he stopped and begged the turbulent crowd to leave the hall. The disturbers did not leave, but they interrupted him afterward less frequently. The Mayor and several police were in the hall, but no perceptible effort was made to stop the disturbance. Secretary Carlisle was interrupted continuously during his speech, and eggs were thrown about the hall, four being thrown upon the platform. There were many noisy people on the street, and in such spirit as to threaten violence as well as insult to the Secretary. The authorities had not taken radical action to prevent disturbance up to this time, but after the meeting the Mayor and Chief of Police promptly furnished a detachment of twenty police, who safely and quietly escorted Secretary Carlisle to the residence of Frank Helm.

PRINCETON'S GREAT DAY.

Cleveland Participates in the Celebration of a University's Birth.

President Cleveland's address was the principal feature of the Princeton College celebration at Princeton, N. J. It was delivered in Alexander Hall, whence he had been escorted on foot through the college grounds from President Patton's house by the Philadelphia City Troop, Mrs. Cleveland riding in an open carriage with Mrs. Patton.

The exercises opened with a prayer by Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, of Brooklyn. After Dr. Cuyler's prayer, President Patton made the formal announcement that what was formerly the College of New Jersey will henceforth and forever be known as Princeton University. A scene of wonderful enthusiasm greeted Dr. Patton's remarks. He then announced the endowment fund received, amounting to nearly a million and a half dollars, not including the amounts contributed for Blair Hall by John I. Blair, of Blairstown, N. J., and the new library

INDIANA STATE NEWS.

OCCURRENCES DURING THE PAST WEEK.

An Interesting Summary of the More Important Doings of Our Neighbors—Weddings and Deaths—Crimes, Casualties and General News Notes of the State.

Minor State Items.

Garret Creamer, aged 90, Jay county farmer, is dead.

Schools at Hazelwood, Hendricks County, have been closed, on account of an epidemic of scarlet fever.

J. W. Henderson, an attorney, was bound over to Court at Richmond, charged with embezzling the funds of the Odd Fellows' Lodge.

Naturalization papers were filed by twelve residents of Kokomo, last week. Of the twelve from foreign lands, eleven are Englishmen.

Newton M. Wallace of Indianapolis, out of work and despondent, swallowed morphine and was removed to the hospital in a dying condition.

The Wilson McCulloch Fruit Jar Works in South Marion have began operations after a prolonged idleness. About one hundred men are employed.

Maj. William L. John of Richmond, died, aged 91. Neither wife nor child survive him. He was born in Ohio, but had lived in Indiana most of his life.

Otto Kolmer of Kokomo, aged 12, is in a critical condition from swallowing coal oil. He tried to "spit fire," as older boys were doing by putting oil in their mouths and setting fire to it.

Fire destroyed the large dairy barn of H. Satterwhite at Martinsville. The entire contents of farm implements, wagons grain and forty tons of hay were destroyed, entailing a heavy loss.

Mrs. John Kelly's little girl of Anderson, appeared at a hole in the side of the house, where cats are wont to go in and out. The mother thought her a cat and dashed hot water into her face. She will be disfigured for life.

Mrs. Jonathan Stansbury of Fortville, is dead. Her husband survives her. Both were past 90 years of age and claimed to be the oldest married couple in the state. A few years ago, they celebrated their seventieth wedding anniversary.

Two Richmond high school boys are suspended as a result of putting some fertilizer on the floor of the assembly room one day last week, and creating such a stench that the room could not be used for several hours.

Quail shooting, which is out of season, seems to be in order around Jackson Hill, and hundreds of the feathered tribe are being killed every day. It is said that they are selling for $2.50 per dozen in a neighboring town. The woods and fields in the vicinity are alive with them.

Samuel L. Carter of Union City, aged 83 years, is dead. He was the oldest inhabitant in the town, having laid out the first lots. He was an ardent abolitionist, and his house used to be one of the stations of the "underground railroad." Later he became a Republican, and after the war was a Prohibitionist.

An attempt was made a few nights ago by an incendiary to burn the Merchants' Hotel at Franklin, but the timely discovery of the fire prevented great damage. A hole had been knocked in the wall in one of the rooms and stuffed with rags and paper. These had been lighted, a bed rolled in front to prevent discovery and the door locked. Too much had been forced into the aperture to burn freely; hence the plan failed.

John and Barringer Brown of Crown Point, and several other large stock raisers along the Kankakee River have suffered heavy losses during the past two weeks by valuable horses dying of an unknown disease. Up to date over one-hundred have died. Many more are effected with the disease, which is a mystery to the veterinarians. As soon as the disease attacks them their blood turns to water and they soon die.

Mrs. O. P. Burgett, Sr., of Nineveh, who for some time has been an inmate of Dr. Fletcher's sanitarium, at Indianapolis, made a distressing attempt at suicide. Taking from her husband's pocket a large knife while he was asleep she slashed her throat, cutting one gash several inches long and several smaller ones. She then forced her fingers into the wounds and was endeavoring to tear the flesh apart when she was discovered. Her injuries are not necessary fatal. Mrs. Burgett has been insane for some time, and application was recently made for her admission to the Central Insane Hospital, where she will be taken as soon as possible.

At the soldiers and sailors' reunion in Wabash a few days ago, Rev. D. W. Fowler sprung a sensation in stating that he knew where there were buried, on a farm within a few miles of Wabash, two large boxes of Southern muskets. He asserted that they were placed there about the time of the Pogue's Run riot at Indianapolis, and had remained undisturbed ever since. The owner of the farm, who was a sympathizer with the "lost cause," died long ago, and he had promised the widow not to divulge the secret of the hidden guns until after her death. Rev. Fowler said he intended then to have the boxes unearthed and the guns distributed among G. A. R. posts of Indiana.

Hoosier inventions: Horace R. Allen, Indianapolis, disinfecting apparatus; Geo. Bonenberger, Evansville, mine trap door; Alvord Butterfield, Indianapolis, farm gate; Malcolm Dickerson, Fort Wayne, electric conduit and appurtenances; Joseph M. Dills, South Bend, show case; Eli J. Gilpin, Fowler, removable handle for sauce pans; Oscar H. Lehman, Evansville, fastener for tail pieces of musical instruments; John Matheny, Indianapolis, safety egg case; John H. Wagner, Terre Haute, railway switch; Andrew Walton, Huntington, adjustable curtain bracket and support; Isaac Wanner, Vera Cruz, rotary engine.

Willis Elzey, aged 35, who attempted to assault the two little girls of Joel Frye, near Bluffton, has pleaded guilty to the charge and been sent up for five years. He confessed that he had been in the pen before for larceny and also for rape.

General Morton C. Hunter, one of the best-known citizens and soldiers of Southern Indiana, and Chairman of the Indiana Soldiers' Commission, was stricken with paralysis at Bloomington and is at the point of death. He was Colonel of the Eighty-second Indiana and represented his district in Congress for four years. He is 71 years old.

While Thomas Shepard was cleaning a hot stove at his home in Connersville with gasoline, the can exploded, throwing the burning liquid on his 3-year-old daughter, who was so severely burned from her hips down that her life is despaired of. Her father in attempting to extinguish the flames was severly burned about the face and hands.

William Ray shot and perhaps fatally injured his brother, Timothy Ray at Bloomington. The trouble is the climax of a whitecapping given William Ray several weeks ago. He met his brother and accused him of testifying against him before the grand jury, and without further words shot him twice. William Ray is now in jail.

Finance.—The great difficulty in the financial world to-day is the lack of faith and lack of honesty among men. Pure thoughts and honest dealings are the issue in the financial system.—Rev. W. J. Brougher, Baptist, Paterson, N. J.

Church Members.—It is to church members that the world looks for its moral example. The church should not be a hospital for moral weaklings, but a strong and aggressive instrument of the right.—Rev. T. C. Warner, Methodist, Baltimore, Md.

Truth.—It is the truth despised and rejected of men that redeems the soul thrown open to receive it. You will find when you identify yourself with the despised truth that God is close at hand.—Rev. M. H. Marvin, Methodist, Spokane, Wash.

Christ.—Christ to-day is the central figure in the thoughts of the civilized world, and is becoming more and more so daily. For the past 1800 years interest in him has been steadily growing.—Rev. S. J. Blum, Moravian, York, Pa.

The Cross.—The cross of Jesus alone has been able to attract and develop the thought, the feeling and the will of mankind and of men. Let us stand before it until our manhood is complete.—Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, Congregationalist, Chicago, Ill.

God's Love.—God loves us personally and not simply in the aggregate. He loves us with a personal affection; we are not lost in the crowd. Let us grasp the truth that God first loved us, not that we loved him.—Rev. Dr. Scott, Presbyterian, Galveston, Tex.

Discontent.—Ours is a time of mental ferment. This age, with all its wealth, its knowledge, its splendor, has been justly termed the age of discontent. A sense of impending crisis is strong in the minds of leading thinkers.—Rev. N. Luccock, Methodist, Pittsburg, Pa.

Religion.—Religion is a certainty, a fact. It has transformed Europe and has given to us our own proud civilization. And as it has been transforming the lives of individual men.—Rev. W. A. Phillips, Methodist, Chicago, Ill.

Activity.—Labor is not ignoble and a curse. It is divine. It uplifts nations and produces all things. It keeps men moral. Never did a revolution take place when men were active. It was idle men which caused the Reign of Terror in France.—Rev. J. E. Williams, Methodist, Pittsburg, Pa.

Preaching to Sinners.—The trouble with the pulpit to-day is, however, that it is chary of touching on the sins and the sinners of to-day. They prefer to preach of sinners of 2,000 years ago, because they are dead and have fewer friends in the congregation.—Rev. R. S. MacArthur, Baptist, New York city.

Human Needs.—Human needs are boundless; every reform paves the way for another. Utopia retreats before us, for our ideals grow faster than our achievements. Character, too, consists in endless progress. Perfection can never be attained in a moment, or even in time.—Rev. E. T. Root, Congregationalist, Providence, R. I.

Temptation.—It is the common lot to be tempted. No man escapes, be he beggar or prince. We must all pass through the fiery ordeal, and especially are those tempted who are trying to follow in the footsteps of the Lord. It is impossible to tell how temptation is coming, or to avoid it. Before the diadem we must year the crown of thorns.—Rev. Tracy Walsh, Episcopalian, Sumter, S. C.

Combination.—The true interests of civilization are best conserved by combinations and not by competition. The competition that downs opposition and laughs at the downfall of competitors is born of the devil. It is through combination of interests that the wheels of industry are best kept going, and civilization preserved.—Rev. B. L. Whitman, Baptist, Washington, D. C.

Politics.—The Christian ought to keep out of corrupt schemes in politics, but he ought to be in politics with his noble manhood, his sensitive conscience, his high appreciation of right and honor with a full and manly determination that the Ten Commandments have a place in politics. A man has no right to be any the less a Christian in relation to public affairs than when he is in the church.—Rev. J. B. Markware, Lutheran, Allegheny, Pa.

Food for the Soul.—Sin is a condition of starvation. Everything that lives eats. The flowers of the field feed on the early morning dew and the bright sunshine, and all things else have to have sustenance. This planet cannot produce anything rich enough for the soul of man. God is the food of the soul, and the soul is starving that is without him.—Rev. F. C. Inglehart, Methodist, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Provoking Ways of African Natives.

When I arrived at the Luapula, the natives were afraid; they heard my rifle yesterday as I was hunting, and thought war had come. I succeeded in making friends. The natives are very provoking at times; they are overbearing when they have an opportunity to thwart you or humbug you. In crossing rivers in their canoes, they get pay beforehand, take some of your loads, then stay in midstream and demand more pay. The tact and patience exercised by a white traveler are the only things which save many a row.—Century.

The Book He Wanted.

Illustrative of the old saying that a certain class of intelligence can ask more questions than a wise man can answer in a long time, a man about Concord, Mass., recently met Dr. Emerson, son of Ralph Waldo Emerson, and asked him if he might borrow some of his books. "Certainly," said the doctor; "any you like." A day or so after the man called. "You said I might take a book," he began. "You may have any you like," replied the doctor. "Well, kindly loan me your miscellaneous book over the fireplace."

CHAPTER I.

"The 8:45 for Chicago? Just gone. It's the last train this evening. First in the morning at 6:15, miss."

"Gone!" cried the girl in despair. She reached out her hand and caught one of the wooden pillars supporting the roof of the little station at Millway.

It was almost dark. Nine o'clock had struck. The straight warm rain was falling through the dusky, windless air. It was an evening towards the end of June—the last Wednesday of that month. There was not a sound but the dull muffling beat of the rain upon the roof. Not a soul visible but the girl and station agent.

She took her hand away from the wooden pillar, and gathered her cloak round her, in preparation for going.

"Can I do anything for you, miss? Have you far to walk?" asked the man.

She did not answer his question; she asked instead: "Do you think the rain will stop soon?"

He glanced at the thin line of dull, dark leaden sky. "No, miss, I don't think it will. It looks as if 'twould rain all night."

She sighed, moved her shoulders under the cloak to settle it, and saying "Thank you," in a listless way, moved with drooping head slowly out of the station, raised her umbrella and walked under the huge beeches of a broad, deserted road-leading southward.

Although her pace had not been quick, she felt her breath come short. The mild, moist, scent-laden air seemed too rich for freshening life and cooling the blood. She was tired, and would have liked to sit down and rest, but neither time nor place allowed of pause. She must get on—she must get back as quickly as possible, or she might be too late, too late to regain Eltham House and steal unperceived to her room there. To that hateful Eltham House, under which to-night rested that odious Oscar Leigh. Oscar Leigh, the grinning, bold, audacious man.

Owing to the loss of the little money left her by her father, Edith Grace had been obliged to try and get something to do, as she could not consent to encroach on the slender income of her grandmother, Mrs. Grace, the only relative she had in the world. As she had been so long with Mrs. Grace, she thought the thing to suit her best would be a companionship to an elderly or invalid lady. She advertised in the daily papers, and the most promising looking reply came from Mr. Oscar Leigh, of Eltham House, Millway, who wanted a companion for his infirm mother. Mr. Leigh could not give much salary, but if advertiser took the situation, she would have a thoroughly comfortable and highly respectable home. Mr. Leigh could make an appointment for a meeting in Chicago.

The meeting took place at Mrs. Grace's lodgings, and although Miss Grace shrank from the appearance and manners of Mr. Leigh, she accepted the situation.

Mr. Oscar Leigh was very short, and had shoulders of unequal height, and a slight hunch on his back. His face was long and hollow cheeked. The eyes small and black, and piercingly bright. His expression was saturnine, sinister, cruel. His teeth were fang-like and yellow. His voice hollow when he spoke low, and harsh when he raised it. His breath came in short gasps now and then. He drooped towards the right side, and carried a short and unusually thick stick, with huge rugged and battered crook. Miss Grace would have pitied him only for his impudent glances. She would have loathed him only she could not forget that his deformities were deserving of pity. The bargain was there and then completed, and it had been arranged that she should go to Eltham House that day week.

This night that was now upon her and around her, this dull, dark, heavy-perfumed, rain-drowned midsummer night, was the night of that day week. Only one week lay between the visit of this hunchback and this day. This morning she had left Chicago and seen Millway for the first time in her life. She had got there at noon and driven straight to Eltham House. The hire of the cab had made considerable inroad on the money in her pocket. The sum was now reduced to only a few cents more than her mere train fare to Chicago. When she got there she would have to walk home. Oh! walking home through the familiar streets thronged with everyday folk, would be so delightful compared with this bleak, solitary Eltham House, this hideous, insolent, monstrous deformed dwarf.

It was impossible for her to stay at Eltham House, utterly impossible. This man Leigh had told her he should see little or nothing of her at the place, and yet when she reached the house his was the first face and figure she laid eyes on. He had opened the door for her and welcomed her to Eltham House, and on the very threshold he had attempted to kiss her! Great heavens! it was incredibly horrible, but it was true! The first man who had ever dared to try to kiss her was this odious beast, this misshapen fiend, this scented monster!

And yet she was on her way back to Eltham House! There was no alternative. She had nowhere else to go. For lack of courage and money she could not venture upon an hotel. She had never been from home alone before, and she felt as if she were in a new planet. She was not desperate, but she was awkward, timid, afraid.

Wet and lonely as the night was, she would have preferred walking about till morning rather than return to that house. All the time she was in the house Leigh had forced his odious, insolent attentions upon her. He had lain in wait for her with expostulations for her prudery in not allowing him to welcome her in patriarchal fashion to his house! Patriarchal fashion, indeed! He had himself said he knew he was not an Adonis, but that he was not a Methuselah either, and his poor, simple, paralyzed mother told her he was thirty-five years old. She would not take all the money in the world to stay in a house to which he was free. At eight o'clock that evening she had pleaded fatigue and retired to her own room for the night. When she found herself alone with the door locked, she thought over the events of the day and her position, and in the end made up her mind to escape and return to town at once. She wrote a line to the effect that she was going, and placed it on the dressing table by the window.

Her room was on the ground floor, and the window wide open. She could creep in and change her wet boots and clothes and sit up in the easy chair till morning. Then she could steal away again, walk to the railway station and take the first train for the city.

From the time the girl cleared the straggling outskirts of the town until she gained the high hedge and gateway of her destination she did not meet or overtake a soul. With serious trepidation, she pushed the gate open and entered the grounds. She emerged from the cover of the trees and hastened across the open drive. Thank heaven, the window was open! After a severe struggle she found herself in the room.

With great caution she searched where she knew her trunk lay open, found the garments she needed, and replaced her wet clothing with dry. She resolved to sit still. It was eleven o'clock. It would be bright daylight in a few hours. As soon as the sun rose she should, if the rain had ceased, leave the house and wander about in the bright open daylight until time to take the first train for Chicago. She sat with her back to the partition between her and the dining room. She had not dared to move the heavy chair for fear of making noise.

"Have you done, Oscar?"

"Yes, mother. I have finished for the night."

Edith Grace sat up in her chair and gasped with terror. The words seemed spoken at her ear. The voices were those of Oscar Leigh, the hunchback dwarf, and his mother, Mrs. Leigh, the paralyzed old woman!

"Yes," the voice of the man said, "I have made the drawings and calculations. It has taken me time—a great deal of time, mother. But I am right. I have triumphed. I generally am right, mother. I generally do triumph, mother." He spoke in a tone of elation. "But you are tired. It has been a long day for you."

"No, Oscar. I am feeling quite well and lively and strong to-night. For an old woman, who has lost the use of her limbs, I keep very well. When you are with me, I do not seem so old, my son."

"Old! Old!" he cried, with harsh, emphatic gayety. "You are not old, mother! You are a young woman. You are a girl, compared with the old women I know. Up to sixty-five a woman ages faster than a man, but once over sixty-five, women grow young again. Mother, I mean to astonish you soon. I mean to marry a very handsome wife. I have one in my eye already. You know I never make up my mind to do anything that in the end does not come off. But before I marry I must finish my great work. When I have put the last touches to it I shall sell it for a large sum, and retire from business, and live here with you, mother, at my ease."

"And when, my dear, do you think the great clock will be finished? It is the only thing in the world I am jealous of. Have you added any new wonders to it?"

The fright had by this time died out of Edith's heart. She now understood who the owners of the voices were, why the speakers seemed so near. Oscar Leigh was talking to his mother in the dining room. They both believed she was in deep sleep and could not hear, or they forgot the thinness of the substance separating them. Between the dining room and where she sat was only the slight panel of a folding door.

CHAPTER II.

"Soon, soon, mother. It shall be finished soon. I cannot tell exactly when, but not very far off. I see the end of my labors, the reward of all my study, the fruit of all my life," said the voice of the hunchbacked dwarf.

"About the clock," said Mrs. Leigh. "You were going to tell me what new wonders you have added to it, and when the crowning wonder of all was to be fixed."

"Oh, ay, the clock. Of course. Mother, when I sell my unrivaled clock, I'll give up living in the city and come down here to you and become a private gentleman."

"But why can't you come down and stop here always, my Oscar? Surely your clock could be brought to Millway."

"Dear, dear mother, I cannot move the clock. You forget how large it is. I have told you over and over again it would half fill this room. Besides, I have other business in the city I cannot leave just now. I will come as soon as ever I can. You may take my word for that. I was going to explain to you about my marvelous clock. Let me see. What have I already told you?"

"Oh, it was too wonderful to remember. Tell me over again."

"Very well. To begin with, it will, of course, measure time first of all. That is the principal and easiest thing to contrive. It will show the year, the month, the day of the month, the day of the week, the hour of the day, the minute of the hour, the second of the minute, the tenth of the second. All these will be shown on one dial."

"That much alone puzzles and astonishes me. It will be the most useful clock in the world."

"So far that is all easy, and would not make it even a very remarkable clock, mother. It will take account of leap years, and be constructed to run till the year ten thousand of the Christian era."

"When once wound up?"

"Oh, no, you simple mother. It will have to be wound up every week."

"But will not the machinery wear out?"

"Yes, the metal and the stones will wear out and rust out before eight thousand years. But the principle will have eight thousand years of vitality in it. Steel and brass and rubies yield to friction and time, but a principle lives forever if it is a true principle——"

"And a good principle," interrupted the voice of the old woman piously.

"Good or bad, if it is true it will last," said the voice of the hunchback harshly. Then he went on in more gentle and even tones: "On another face it will tell the time of high water in fifty great maritime cities. There will be four thousand figures of time, figures of all the great men of the past, each bearing a symbol of his greatest work, or thought, or achievement, and each appearing on the anniversary of his death; thus there will be from eight to twenty figures visible each day, and that day will be the anniversary of the one on which each of the men died years ago."

"Four thousand figures! Why, it will cost a fortune!"

"Four thousand historic figures each presented on the anniversary of death! I am at work on the figures of those who died on the 22d of August just now. They are very interesting to me, and one of them is the most interesting of all the four thousand figures. Richard Plantagenet, of Gloucester, commonly called Richard the Third of England, and nicknamed the Hunchback Tyrant," maliciously.

"Oscar!" in a tone of protest and misery.

"Yes. Hump and all, I am now making the figure of the most famous hunchback in history. I take delight in modeling the figure of my Hunchback Tyrant. In body and soul I can sympathize with—him." He spoke furiously, and there was a sound in the room as if he rose.

"Oh, you break my heart, my boy, my boy, my son! Don't, don't. You cut me to the soul! You frighten me when you look in that way." She spoke in terror and anguish.

"Break your heart, mother!" went on Leigh, in a tone of excitement. "What hurt can words do? Look at me! Me! If I were to say my heart was broken, no one would wonder. I am not reproaching you. Heaven knows, if I turned upon you, I should have no friend left in all the world. Not one who would care for me—care whether I lived or died, whether I prospered or was hanged by the common hangman on a gibbet!"

"Oh, Oscar! What has soured you so? You never talked in this way until now. What has changed you?" The woman was weeping through her words.

"A girl's face. A girl's face has changed me. I, who had a heart to the core of adamant befitting the crooked carcass in which it is penned and warped. But there! I have been vaporing, mother. Let my words pass. I am myself again. I know your advice is good. I mean to follow it. I will marry a wife. I will marry a pretty, shapely wife. You shall have grandchildren at your knee, mother, before long, before you go."

"Who is she? Do I know her? Do I know even her name?"

"All that is my secret, mother. I will not say any more of her but that I am accustomed to succeed, and I will succeed here. I will keep the secret of her name in my heart to goad me on. I am accustomed to succeed. Rest assured I will succeed in this. We will say no more of it. Let it be a forbidden subject between us until I speak of it again; until, perhaps, I bring her to you. Ah! that storm has cleared the air. I was excited. I have reason to be excited to-day. At this moment—it is now just twelve o'clock—at this moment I am either succeeding or failing in one of my most important aims."

"Just now, Oscar. Do you mean here?"

"No, not here. In Chicago. You do not believe in magic, mother?"

"Surely not. What do you mean?"

"Or in clairvoyance or specters?"

"No, my child. Nor you, I hope."

"And yet not everything—not half everything—is understood even now."

"Will you not tell me of this, either?"

"Not to-night, mother. You know I had a week ago no intention of coming here to-day. I did not come to welcome Miss Grace. I had another reason for coming. I am trying an experiment to-night. At this moment I am putting the result of many anxious hours to the touch. If my experiment turns out well I shall come into a strange power. And now, mother, it is very late for you. We must go to bed. That patent couch still enables you to do without aid in dressing."

SHIELDED BY PROVIDENCE.

Two Missiles that Met in the Air and Fell Harmless.

A half dozen or so men were sitting out in front of an up-town hotel the other evening telling stories.

"When I was 21," said a tall man, evidently from a Southern State, "I had an ungovernable temper, and a half-brother three years older than myself. We were both church members, but that didn't seem to bring us any closer together, for he was a Methodist and I was a Baptist. You may have observed," he threw in as a decoration to the story, "that Christian charity and brotherly love don't always thrive on denominational feed. However, as I was saying, we were of different denominations, and we got along fairly well together until we began arguing on our respective faiths. Then we got hot, and I always lost my temper. I may say that he did very nearly the same, but he wasn't quite as bad as I was in that regard.

"One day we were out hunting with only one gun, a squirrel rifle, between us, and I had the gun. I may add here that we lived on a farm, and a one-gun hunting party was not at all unusual. We had sat down on a rock near the edge of a stream to rest, and in some way I slipped and went into the water. It made me mad to begin with, and when he began chaffing me and telling me that a Baptist ought to be used to a little thing like that, I got ten times worse, and hit him a lick in the face. He ran off a few yards and picked up a boulder about as big as your double fist, while I made a grab for the gun, which I had set up against a willow under the bank.

"Of course, we did not know what we were doing by this time; only I remember telling him if he raised his hand to throw the stone I'd shoot him. He was nervy, though, and I hadn't more than got the words out of my mouth than he let the boulder come at me, and, true to my word, I banged away at him. We weren't forty feet apart, and it was a stand-off between the boulder and the bullet as to which was the more dangerous, but Providence, I reckon, was watching over us, for as I fired the boulder flew into a dozen pieces, and both of us were left standing looking at each other in a dazed, helpless kind of way. Then, still not understanding what had happened, but realizing how nearly our tempers had brought us to bloodshed, we rushed into each other's arms and began crying over each other.

"When we had got over the excitement and collected our wits sufficiently to make an investigation, we discovered that by the merest chance—by Providential interference, I mean—my bullet and his boulder had met in their flight and nullified each other. On one piece of the broken stone we found the blue mark of the bullet, and in another place we found the battered bullet. He took the bullet and I took the piece of marked stone, and we have kept them to this day as sacred souvenirs, and as very potent reminders never to discuss our respective beliefs. I'm just as strong a Baptist as ever, and he is equally a Methodist, but we both believe that greater than either Baptist or Methodist is the Providence that watches over us all."—Washington Star.

THE OLD-TIME RALLY.

POLITICAL RALLIES.

POPULAR METHOD OF BOOMING CANDIDATES.

Recollections of the Days When Political Feeling Ran High—Barbecues as a Means of Acquiring Votes—"Ship of State" in the Parade.

Campaigns of Old Times.

The evolution of the "Presidential election" as we know it and the changes in what one may call its peculiar surface aspects from one quadrennial period to another afford some oddly interesting themes for reflection, more especially if one can look back in his own memory over several of these periods and distinguish some of the characteristic features of each.

Probably comparatively few among the masses of our people know that it was never intended by the framers of the Constitution of the republic that they, the people, should ever knowingly vote for any individual for President of the United States. It was the undoubted purpose of the framers of the Constitution that the Electoral College should use all its supposed superiority of learning, capacity and high character in the choice of a President, and should be absolutely free to vote for whomsoever their several, individual judgments held to be the best fitted for the executive office.

The earlier elections were conducted on this theory, but, as should have been foreseen, the practice could not continue. The party convention system was devised, the convention declared for whom their Electors, if chosen by the people, should vote, and the Electoral College was driven at a blow to being only a recording board of the will of a convention.

As a matter of fact, the Electors are still independent. They have the legal right and power to vote for any eligible man they please, whether his name was ever heard in the conventions of the parties or not. Nothing but their implied pledges in accepting party candidacy for their positions—their "word of honor," in effect—binds the Electors chosen to vote for the nominees. They may, if they choose, wholly ignore the candidates and proceed to elect any other eligible man they choose, and the nation would be legally bound to accept their choice. But if they should try any such legal antic as this it would be well for them to make their wills in advance.

It was not until Jackson's time that the partisan convention secured a firm foothold, and by 1840 the election had taken on the openly popular characteristics which have been popular ever since. The campaign of that year was unique and exciting, and General William H. Harrison, with the glamour of military glory, his vivacious motto of "two dollars a day and roast beef," and his log cabin representations, kept the country ablaze from one end to the other. "Tippecanoe and Tyler, too!" was the rallying cry of the Whigs; barbecues and oratory were the stronghold of the Van Buren party; and probably never before nor since was so much genuine enthusiasm infused into a campaign. It was a great whirl of excitement—processions, feastings, grove picnics, in which nearly every voter took part. It, however, reached the high-water mark of purely physical excitement, for by 1844 the aspect was changed. Bands and the organizing power of machine politics took the place of realism, and the campaign four years later had nothing of the old fire, and all efforts to revive old methods failed in 1856. In 1860 the emotional came in again but it was not undirected and erratic as it had been twenty years earlier. More and more since then, political campaigning has fallen out of the daytime and become a matter of evening meetings. During the late 60's and 70's the "marching clubs" came in, with torchlight displays, an evolution from the "wideawakes" of 1860. The marching clubs remain, but the torchlights have largely been extinguished, and all rest more and more on the quiet work of the organization—the "central committees," with their literary, speaking, music, financial and other subdivisions.

The country rally, however, has remained a feature of the canvass, and every county seat has from two to ten every campaign. Not even a circus can make a town so lively. Back in the 60's rallies were the thing. Every rally had a ship of state, made by the village carpenter, carrying thirty-six plump, buxom country girls, representing the different States—there were only thirty-six then—and a gay load they made, in white dresses, all alike, pasteboard crowns, and blue ribbon sashes across their breasts. On the coronet appeared the letters that spelled the name of the State. Flags and banners completed the rigging of the ship, and it created a furore wherever it went.

The township which could bring the best delegation to the edge of town could have the place of honor at the head of the procession and could carry a banner that was offered as a prize by some man who wanted to go to the Legislature in the fall. And about 8 o'clock in the morning of rally day the county seat would be a pretty busy place. In every direction from the courthouse there were aids-de-camp riding swiftly between the marshals of their respective delegations and the grand marshal of the whole thing, who waited on a black horse near the courthouse, and who tried to smoke a cigar and take care of the bridle reins at one and the same time—and couldn't do either very well.

Country rallies nowadays are not so demonstrative as of yore, but ratifications, the joint debates, the meeting to welcome candidates or noted orators still give a vivid spur to campaigning. Episodes are not infrequent, however, like that occurring in 1876, when the Democrats had a rally in a middle Indiana county.

The ship of state was so heavy with its burden of representative young women that it broke the bridge and fell through into the Wabash River. In spite of the fact that the vessel was supposed to be seaworthy, it went to the bottom at one dive, and it took nearly all the rest of the parade to rescue the young women.

Napoleon's Army Before Waterloo.

On the eve of hostilities Napoleon had 124,000 effectives, with 3,500 in his camp train; Wellington had 106,000, but of these 4,000 Hanoverians were left in garrison; Blucher had about 117,000. Neither of the two allied generals dreamed that Napoleon would choose the daring form of attack upon which he decided—that of a wedge driven into the scattered line nearly a hundred miles in length upon which his enemy lay—for to do so he must pass the Ardennes. But he did choose it, and selected for the purpose the valleys of the Sambre and the Meuse. Allowing for the differences in topography, the idea was identical with that which, nineteen years before, he had executed splendidly in Piedmont.—Century.

NEW USE FOR TROLLEY CARS.

Plan to Improve the Character of Horseracing in America.

It is proposed by a man who has followed the races for years and who is fully aware of the disrepute into which the turf has fallen to construct a track for trolley cars around the inner rail of a race track. It should be built with a single rail, after the manner of Boynton's bicycle road, and the cost would be small, as the material to be used would be light and inexpensive. On this single track light carriages could be run, in which the racing stewards could ride and keep pace with the horses. From such an advantageous position they could see every move that was made and trickery and crooked work could not be attempted without certain detection.

Following the car in which the stewards ride could be another car or cars for the accommodation of newspaper reporters. The speed of the cars could be controlled by the stewards, and the problem of keeping abreast of the bunch of flyers would be easily solved.

"The scheme is entirely practicable," said the man who made the suggestion, and something of this sort must soon be done if racing is to receive the patronage of the public. No matter how fine the field glasses through which stewards watch a race, it is impossible for them to see everything that happens when the horses are bunched and are at a distance of a quarter of half a mile away and frequently hidden by a cloud of dust. Then everyone knows how much easier it is to watch moving objects when the spectator is also moving. With a trolley car spinning alongside and above racing horses at the same speed they could be seen as perfectly as if they were standing still. Trickery would be impossible and, knowing this, jockeys would not resort to it.

"The presence of racing reporters would also have a salutary effect. Two sharp-eyed stewards and a half-dozen reporters could not be fooled, and the knowledge of this would make horse owners and jockeys careful. In the event of a foul the decision could be made with reasonable certainty that it would be correct. Under the present conditions this is by no means a certainty. With the very best intentions in the world, judges and stewards make mistakes that inflict grievous wrongs on horse owners, jockeys and the public."

FAMOUS PISTOL.

The One with Which Aaron Burr Killed Alexander Hamilton.

The famous pistol with which Aaron Burr killed Alexander Hamilton is now in possession of Mr. Louis Marshall of Versailles, Ky. The weapon has changed hands often, and while in the possession of Mr. Thomas F. Marshall he had the dueling pistol altered from a flint to a percussion lock. It still shoots very accurately, and carries a two-ounce ball. Its barrel, which is 12 inches long, looks more like a section of a shotgun than anything else, while the handle is marked twice with the "X" sign, which meant in the palmy days of dueling that the weapon had done fatal work.

Not Altogether Raw.

Here is a story of a raw recruit who proved a rather dangerous one to joke with. An officer approached and asked for his rifle.

"Let me see your rifle."

The raw recruit handed over his rifle and a pleased smile stole over his face. As the officer received the weapon he said in a tone of deep disgust:

"You're a fine soldier. You've given up your rifle, and now what are you going to do?"

The young fellow turned pale, and putting his hand in his pocket drew out a big knife, and preparing for business said in a voice that could not be misunderstood:

"Gi' me that rifle, or I'll bore a hole through you in a minute."

The officer instantly decided not to play any further with the raw recruit, and the rifle was promptly surrendered.

"I believe," said the candidate, "that my country calls me." "If you are alludin' ter that noise you hearn just now," said the old farmer, "you air somewhat mistook. Hit wur nothin' but the ole mule a-brayin' in the lot."—Atlanta Constitution.

TALL SYCAMORE OF WABASH.

Senator Daniel W. Voorhees May Retire from Public Life.

It is expected in Indiana that Senator Daniel W. Voorhees, who for nearly twenty years has represented the Hoosiers in the upper house of the National Legislature, will soon retire from public life. He is afflicted with heart trouble and his physicians advise rest.

Mr. Voorhees is one of the picturesque figures of the capital. Tall, broad-shouldered, with a handsome face, luxuriant auburn hair and a voice possessing a peculiar charm, he would attract attention anywhere. His appellation, the Tall Sycamore of the Wabash, is familiar in all parts of the country. He is nearing his 70th year. From early life he has been a power in Indiana politics. He was not yet 30 when he first ran for Congress as a Democrat and was defeated. Four years later, in 1860, he was successful and served two terms. Then he was defeated twice for re-election and applied himself diligently to the practice of law. Had he kept out of politics and devoted himself to his profession he would have been the foremost lawyer of the West. But in 1868 he returned to the political field and was sent back to Congress. In 1877 he succeeded Oliver P. Morton as United States Senator and still holds that seat.

Senator Voorhees' ability as an orator, no less than his political sagacity, has made him a power in State and national affairs of the Democratic party. He has a strong voice. "Let a mob come rushing down the street," says a local historian, "Voorhees could put them at bay with a single plea, for all would stop to listen." Voorhees is one of the giants of Indiana politics who have made that State famous—such men as Morton, Hendricks, Harrison and Gresham.

DANIEL W. VOORHEES.

The Pueblo Women.

"The Pueblo-Indian women are often very pretty as girls, and some of them make stately young mothers," writes Hamlin Garland in the Ladies' Home Journal. "They work generally in groups of three or four, cooking, whitewashing, weaving, or painting pottery. They seem to have a good deal to chatter about, and their smiling faces are very agreeable. They have most excellent white teeth. Their ceremonial dress is very picturesque, especially the costume of the Acoma and Isleta girls. All burdens are carried by the women of Acoma, Isleta and Laguna upon the head, and they have, in consequence, a magnificent carriage, even late in life. The old women of Walpi, on the contrary, are bent and down-looking. They carry their burdens on their backs slung in a blanket. The girls of Isleta wear a light cloth over their heads Spanish fashion, and manage it with fine grace and coquetry. The every-day dress of the Hopi women consists of a sort of kilt, which is wrapped around the hips and fastened with a belt (a modification of the blanket or wolf-skin); above this a sort of sleeveless chemise partly covers the bosom. Their hair is carefully tended, but it worn in an ungraceful mode by some of the women. The women of Hano cut the hair in front square across about the line of the lips, while the back hair is gathered into a sort of billet. The front hair hangs down over the faces, often concealing one eye. The unmarried women in Walpi wear their hair in a strange way. They coil it into two big disks just above their ears—the intent being to symbolize their youth and promise by imitating the squash flower. The matrons correspondingly dress their hair to symbolize the ripened squash. Some of the maidens were wonderfully Japanese in appearance."

One Good Turn Deserves Another.

The coachman of the King of Hanover lost his wife. The King's chaplain performed the funeral ceremony. Soon afterward the chaplain received a visit from the coachman, whose deep mourning testified to appreciation of his great bereavement.

Evidently in much embarrassment he stood turning his banded hat round and round, but at last managed the following:

"I've called, sir—I've called, sir—as I wish to ask—and don't like to put it off—what I've got to pay you for that 'ere job?"

"Oh," said the chaplain, "nothing, of course. I have no fees; but I remember now I am in your debt, and I must ask you what I am to pay you for the two pots of ointment you made for my horse's cracked feet?"

"Bless you, sir, don't mention it!" said the coachman. "Nothing, sir, nothing; one good turn deserves another all the world over!"

Spontaneous Combustion.

The Iowa Dairy Mutual Fire Insurance Company has issued a circular containing the following on spontaneous combustion: "Sawdust in icehouses is self-ignitable, caused by spontaneous combustion in hot weather. In order to avoid a fire from above cause the sawdust should not be allowed to pile up over four or five inches on top of the ice. The surplus should be removed and kept out of the icehouse. Where the sawdust is allowed to accumulate on top of your ice it will consume the ice. It should have daily care during the hot weather."

"If I could but call this little hand mine," he said, caressingly. "What would you do with it, Jack?" she said, playfully. "Stand pat," he replied, "and wait for a good chance to call your father's."—Philadelphia North American.

Shively.

The next governor had a good audience this afternoon and made one of the very strongest speeches heard this campaign from any body. His statements were clear and his arguments simply unanswerable. He captivated his hearers from the first and held them to the close as no other speaker has been able do. We made no mistake in choosing our standard bearer.

FREE COINAGE

How It Will Benefit The Workingman.

Mr. W. G. Eggleston will be remembered as the writer of some articles for the Post-Dispatch several months ago, on "The Price of Gold Fixed by Law." At the present time Mr. Eggleston is the managing editor of the Helena, (Mont.) Independent. In the following letter to Mr. Charles B. Cook of St. Louis, Mo., he answers convincingly the question often asked by workingmen: "How will the free coinage of silver benefit me?"

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of October 6, 1896, in regard to the number of miners who would be emp oyed in the west in case of free coinage of silver, conservative estimates by those familiar with mining resources and possibilities in Montana and other mining states place the number at 15,000 in Montana alone, with an additional 50,000 skilled and unskilled laborers in other occupations in this state whose labor would be demanded by increased general business of all kinds on account of increased mining, not only of silver, but of lead, zinc, copper, coal, iron and gold, all of which, except coal are found in our silver-bearing ores.

For the eleven mining states of the west we estimate—on a conservative calculation—500,000 additional miners and other laborers. But it would be a mistake to suppose that any of the miners would be producing silver alone. In the list of dividend and non-dividend paying mines published regularly in the Engineering and Mining Journal of New York, you will find scarcely a mine that produces silver alone. Many mines that begin with silver ore at the surface develop gold lower down—as the great Comstock mine, for example.

Any one can see, then, that free coinage, which means a fixed mint price of $1.29 an ounce for silver, means an enormous increase in our gold production, since it will then pay to work ores containing both gold and silver which cannot now be worked except at a loss. For example. Near Helena is a group of refractory ores, showing at less 1,000,000 tons, showing an average of $13 in gold and sixteen ounces of silver per ton, making the ore worth at present about $23 a ton. Smelting and freight charges on such ore amount to $20 a ton, to say nothing of mining; so that ore can't be worked except at a loss. But with coinage, and $1.29 an ounce for silver, we would get $12,000,000 in gold alone, which cannot be got with silver at its present price. This is but one of hundreds of such ore deposits.

The same is true of immense deposits of silver-lead, silver-copper and other mixed ores. Now consider that a large part of that $13,000,000 of gold lying near this city would, if mined, be spent for farm and factory products of the eastern and middle states, to say nothing of the silver and other metals so used!

Free coinage of silver will therefore enable our people to dig their own gold out of American mountains, instead of borrowing it from England and paying interest for its use, besides increasing our production of other metals.

As to employing the surplus and now unemployed labor of eastern and middle states, free coinage of silver would not only draw from those states at least 500,000 laborers of all kinds to the eleven great mining states, but their personal wants and the needs of their occupations, would create an enormous market for manufactured products of eastern and middle states factories and mills, embracing everything in the way of machinery, food, clothing and implements of all classes of artisans. In the matter of canned goods alone the demand would be enormous. The local demands for skilled labor would include all branches.

Therefore, when the laboring man of the east of the Mississippi valley asks: "Will free coinage of silver put me in the way of getting a job?" the answer is: "Yes; either here at home, or in one of the mining states."

The man who now has a job should remember what effect this will have on the unemployed man who is now trying to get his job at lower wages.

Yours very truly

W. G. EGGLESTON.

Blaine On Silver.

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful produce widespread disaster in and throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver and establishing gold as a sole unit of value must have a ruinious effect upon all forms of property except those improvements which yield a fixed return in money. It is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and disastrous to tens of thousands. I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the constitution; indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the constitution, which the great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on congress to declare either metal should not be money. Congress has in my judgment no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold.—James G. Blaine, February, 1878.

REWARD.

Engish For Silver.

John B. Barnhill, late Editor of "Flora (Illinois) Democrat," furnishes us from London with particular of a remarkable interview with Mr. J. H. Howell, President of the Bristol (England) Bimetalic League, author of several popular pamphlets on Bimetallism, and an Active Currency Reformer.

The following conveysation ensued:—

Question—You are, I believe, an International Bimetallist?

Mr. Howell—Yes I have been one for a dozen years.

Question—Who are the principal supporters of Bimetallism in England?

Mr. Howell—The working classes, undoubtedly. They realize that the yellow man with the cheap white money will strangle them in their industrial competition, if silver is not remonetized in the West. Our hope is in the masses, in enfranchized labor.

Question— Being an international Bimetallist, do you favor Bryan's candidature?

Mr. Howell—I am an earnest supporter of Bryan. I believe he is a "Man of Destiny," and that it is great and glorious mission to emancipate struggling and wronged humanity from the crushing tyranny of the Gold Standard. His election will compel England to fall in with an International agreement, but his defeat, which I do not contemplate, will postpone it for a generation—a period of untold misery for the wage earner and producer?.

Question—What in your opinion, will Continental nations do, in the event of his election?

Mr. Howell—They will gladly join in restoring silver to its old position as the money of redemption by re-opening their mints to its free coinage at the old ratio. No well-informed man doubts it.

Question—Could these nations act without England's co-operation?

MR. HOWELL—Undoubtedly. They, with the United States, could maintain the parity with ease and certainty, in spite of England holding aloof.

Question—What would England do with respect to the Indian Mints?

MR. HOWELL—England is pledged, doubly pledged, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Balfour in the House of Commons, to re-open the Indian Mints, if other nations open theirs, in spite of Lombard Street and the Gold Bugs, who will raise heaven and earth to prevent it.

Question—Would Lombard Street have much influence, think you?

MR. HOWELL—Yes; but the Bimetallists in the Cabinet are its strongest and ablest members, and even at the cost of breaking up the Cabinet, and side-tracking the few Gold Bugs in it, I am convinced Mr. Balfour's pledge will be redeemed to the letter. But everything depends on the United States. If it grasps the nettle resolutely and boldly, England and Europe will follow. The Old World is very conservative in money matters, and, like all old organisms, is timid. The United States is young and vigorous, with a grand future. It can do and dare greatly. The hour has struck, the man has appeared, and victory is assured if the nation is true to itself, and is determined to work out its own salvation.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Quite a number of our people went over to Garrett yesterday afternoon, for a ride through the fine autumn weather, and partly to hear a speech that was made there. Republicans had tried to render useless, the democratic speeches Saturday, by getting up the free excursion to Chicago. So, it was decided that those who took the free ride could only get the benefit of hearing the truth, by being called together after their return. We hear the meeting was largely attended.

It is laughable to see the struggle going on to prove that one party or the other is going to carry about three fourths of the states. Sunday's Times Herald claims about three-fourths of the members of the next House of Representatives for the republicans and in making up the list, puts this district, the 12th Indiana, as republican by 700 majority. The facts are it is pretty safe for a democratic majority of over 3000.

Some of the McKinley men are telling about town, that only a small crowd greeted Bryan in Ft. Wayne, and that those few were of the poorer classes. It will be well to remember that the votes of such men are as big as those of Mark Hanna and his friends.

It is reliably stated that the McKinley parade in Chicago Saturday, brought out more cheers for Bryan than for McKinley. But the crowd had a free ride all the same.

The following is from the London correspondent of the Washington Post, a "scarce money" paper: "McKinley contrives to lead here as a trot favorite. All the newspaper correspondents over your way seem to have the tip to boom the gentleman from Canton. You seldom find a good word put in for Bryan anywhere. He comes in for abuse and caricature."

W. B. Brown reports a grand meeting for Senator Turpie at Butler last evening. The Auburn Free Silver Glee Club was there and rendered a number of their fine campaign songs to the great delight of the audience. Then on the way home they found the meeting of H. D. Boozer still in progress at Mooresville and stoped there awhile. The audience was greater than could get into the house. Here the Club gave also a number of songs and were loudly cheered.

When Aaron Jones, republican, spoke at Cedar Creek a short time ago, the crowd was small, and they needed one republican. So they dressed up a mule in men's clothes, and brought him to the stand and introduced him. They made a mistake and called him Bryan when they should have said McKinley. But they needed some one to act as a republican voter, for that kind is getting mighty scarce down in Butler township. The grand old party is getting pretty hard up for material.

Cook Ford has two clocks, and Monday it was found that one of them had stopped at 16 minutes to 1. Mrs. Ford is a democrat and takes this as an indication that Bryan will be the lucky man. We think she is right.

Gen. Sickles, who has always been too good for his party and is now stumping for Palmer, or rather McKinley says the western tramps are all for Bryan. Let us see. Sickles is the chap who shot and killed a man on the streets of Washington many years ago.

Benjamin Harrison

In his Message to Congress December 1, '90,

The general tariff act has only partially gone into operation, some of its important provisions being limited to take effect at dates yet in the future. The general provisions of the law have been in force less than sixty day. Its permanent effect upon trade and prices still largely stand in conjecture. It is curious to note that the advance in the prices of articles wholly unaffected by the tariff act was by many hastily ascribed to that act. Notice was not taken of the fact that the generally tendency of the markets was upward from influences wholly apart from the recent tariff legislation. The enlargement of our currency by the silver bill undoubtedly gave an upward tendency to trade and had a marked effect on prices; but this natural and desired effect of the silver legislation was by many erroneously attributed to the tariff act.

"Anxious Inquirer," writes us from Corunna if it is true that Sheriff Stroh has promised all the county voters a deputyship under him. Well no, it is it is not as bad as that for we last week heard of a voter up in Troy, who had been left out in the cold. It is a queer fact that being left out in the cold, makes him hot, and he is going to vote for Coop Ralston who has always put in his time earning his salary, not in making votes. But we think our correspondent, must have had in view the men Stroh has promised a place on the jury. "Your name will be the next to come out of the box."

Gold View.

As given out in Sunday's Chicago Tribune. Some campaign secrets given away.

Gold, which is the emblem of civilization and honor, which is the ruler of the Western World, will have a majority in the United States Senate and House of Representatives to cooperate with President McKinley. But a victory even more gigantic has been accomplished. Men of integrity, men of sound hearts and healthy minds, located in all parts of the United States, being in mighty majority, have been grouped together in a silent army, and now hold complete mastery over all the enemies of this Republic. A new epoch has been created and this moral revolution is showing itself in every corner of the country. New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey will give a million majority in favor of national integrity; but Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee, Louisiana, and other Southern States will show moral changes relatively greater. This triumph of Righteousness is the greatest achievement in the history of the human race. Bryanism is a wild and hideous dream, now dying out of the mind of this republic. Our children will look back upon it with a hiss and a shudder, will rejoice in the memory of their fathers who destroyed it, and will grow exultant in the happy thought that because of that destruction, they themselves are growing up with a better environment of morals and will receive the larger inheritance of national honor.

English View.

The Chicago Tribune of Sunday, Oct. 25 has this interesting bit of politics from an English standpoint:

In the way of a pessimist it would be hard to beat a letter on the American situation just received by the Daily Mail from its regular New York correspondent. Having first described himself as an American, this gentleman proceeds to warn English investors that the Americans desire a war with England, mainly because it will then be possible to repudiate every dollar of American indebtedness to Lombard street, and to confiscate every dollar's worth of British property owned in the United States. After pointing out that the better element in America vainly opposed the separation of the colonies from England 120 years ago, the correspondent laments that the same better element is now equally helpless to prevent the republic from sinking through foul corruption and ignorance into political and social chaos. He thinks Mr. McKinley will be defeated, but says that, even if he should be elected, "there will be a civil war between the East and the West."

Lew Wallace.

The most ridiculous speech of the campaign by democrat or republican was that of Gen. Lew Wallace at the opera house last evening. He surely does not know much of politics or else he purposely mistakes all through his speech. He said democrats want to have government buy up all railroads and each man would be called on to to pay his share. No democrat ever advocated such a thing. It is not in the platform. He said Bryan and all his followers were little better than anarchists. He said Bryan, if elected, would go into office pledged to ignore and get along without the aid of a congress. He knows this is false. He said if Bryan is eleeted every postoffice in the country will have to have a postal savings bank attached to it. He said that those who vote for Bryan actually believe that as soon as he is elected they can go to Washington and demand their "proportionate share" of the money in the treasury. This he knows is false. He said democrate would demonetize national money by private contract. He asked how silver democrats and gold democrats liked the idea of not being permitted to make private contracts, if they chose. He should have spent his time in explaining to his hearers how it happened that he lay all day in hearing of the battle, that Sunday, April 6th, 1862 at Pittsburg Landing with 15000 men and failed to come to the help of the defeated and routed union army till after dark, when the day's battle was lost. We have often heard it said, that he never wrote "Ben Hur" but that his wife did it. Since hearing this speech and that one at the band stand, in '80, we are ready to believe that at least some one else besides himself did it.

Returns.

Send in the returns to the COURIER as soon as you can. Let every precinct send the vote as nearly in full as it is possible. Be sure and send the leading county offices. Also govenor, and the presidential vote. We want to get as complete returns in the next Weekly as possible. If some one comes to Auburn send a report by him. If not, send by mail. Dont fail to send returns. The COURIER wants them

Local Ticket

We have a splendid local ticket from James M. Robinson down all through the line, and no democrat can do better than to vote everything straight through by stamping the rooster on the national, state and local ballots. This is easy to do, and there will be no mistakes made or tickets spoiled or lost.

Stamp the rooster on the local ballot just as you do on the state and national More votes are lost by attempts to vote a split ticket than by all other mistakes combined. Enough of these spoiled ballots are usually thrown out in DeKalb county to carry it one way or the other. Don't do this. Stamp the rooster. If you are working for Bryan, alone, stop and think that Bryan will be worse than nothing if he does not have both houses of congress. So stamp the rooster on the local ballot. That secures Robinson for congress which will help to give us the House of Representatives. On the local ballot are also the three legislative candidates, Dr. Nusbaum for state senator, C. M. Brown and Dr. Teal, for members of the legislature. And these three men will be needed to elect a U. S. Senator this winter. Readers of the COURIER should explain this point to all the voters. Then we have an excellent county ticket. Stamping the rooster secures all of them. Gunsenhouser and Shoemaker for commissioners to secure good management for the county; Schulthess for assessor, Hughes for coroner, Hines for treasurer, Ralston for sheriff and Krontz for surveyor All excellent timber. And we should not forget that for two weeks they have doubled forces on our candidate for sheriff, Coop Ralston. We never had a better man or one who made a cleaner record. He saved money to the county but not to himself. That is the kind of economy the people like. Those who want a good officer will stand by him. Again we say, "Stamp the rooster."

Give A Dinner.

—Saunders VanAuken, son of F. B. VanAuken will be principal of schools in Botkins Ohio the coming year.

—M. F. Long became county clerk on Monday, Mr. Moody retiring. We were too busy that day to even think of this important change. But so it is. In about a week the new recorder, Milton Jones, will be here.

—John Krontz reports a splendid meting for Eversole in Butler last night. As usual the republicans got another man to come and speak and try to keep people from hearing him. This time it was S. M. Foster a gold democrat who spoke to the McKinley Club. When Turpie spoke, they got Brown of Toledo. When Colerick spoke, they got Hubbell.

What a Woman Can Do.

Last week I cleared, after paying al expenses, $355,85, the month previous $260 and have at the same time attended to other duties. I believe any energetic person can do equally as well, as I have had very little experience. The Dish Washer is just lovely and every family wants one, which makes selling very easy. I do no canvassing. People hear about the Dish Washer and come or send for one. It is strange that a good, cheap Dish Washer has never before been put on the market. Mound City Dish Washer fills this bill. With it you can wash and dry the dishes for a family of ten in two minutes without wetting your hands. As soon as people see the Washer work they want one. You can make more money and make it quicker than with any household article on the market. I feel convinced that any lady or gentleman can make from $10 to $14 per day around home. You can get full particulars by addressing The Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. They help you get started, then you can make money awful fast. A. L. C. 4

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

Marry This Girl Quick

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad oder and saves oil, it is easy to sell. If you wish to try it send 13 cent stamps to Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A. St. Louis, Mo, and she will send you sample outfit, this is a good way to make money around home.

—If McKinley is elected the bullion in a silver dollar will continue to go down in value as it has ever since 1873. It comes to us that republican speakers are provided with big pewter dimes and dollars, and they show these very ostentationsly on all possible occasions. Judge Penfield had one when he spoke at Newville and drew it out of a stocking which he used as a purse for it. As an object lesson the people there did not go wild over it.

—The Dispatch has an article on "the 5-cent dollar." If the gold standard continues, it may come that. The gold standard began in 1873, with the bullion value of a silver dollar at 103 Last week, it was only 50 cents. If 23 years of gold standard reduced it 53 cents on a dollar, or 2¼ cents a year, then it will take only 17 years to bring it to 5 cents. But if Bryan is elected, and has a congress to back him, the silver in a dollar will at once begin to rise.

—A letter from Tom Scott says that he and all their men at Cleveland employed in railroad shops and similar service were taken to Canton free to see McKinley. A band was paid for and also their supper while there. All free, and a vote in the shops showed that nearly every man voted for McKinley. It will be different, though, on election day.

—The Dispatch still feels bad about the pension matter. Well it should support Bryan. His plan is to make the silver dollar grow better, so the pensioner will get his pay in better dollars, whereas under the McKinley plan the dollars are liable to go down to 5 cents in 17 years, if they fall as they have in the past 23 years. Vote for Bryan and sounder money. Vote for Bryan, the advance agent of prosperity.

Constipation is a curse, and afflicts too great a proportion of the American people It robs men of their energy, women of their beautiful, children of their life and playfulness. Do you want relief? COMMUNICATED

Mr. Editor a few remarks as to the soundness of money. The republican party are howling cheap money at us. Now then Mr. Editor if silver today is called cheap by the republicans, who under the sun made it so but the republican party? They are the instigator of all this evil of demonetizing our silver, and hence the depreciating of our silver bullion. And now Mr. Editor all they can do is to howl cheap money. What kind of money did we have for eighty-two years previous to 1873 and we never heard any one howl cheap money. If the Editor of the Dispatch only knew how ignorant he was by howling a fifty-three cent dollar to an intelligent people of Butler township, why Mr. Editor he would hide his face from view that his friends would never get a glimpse of him probably we will never see him again after November 3d.

Mr. Editor I received a letter from Chicago a few days ago from a brother of mine, telling how I must vote to have prosperity and that vote was to stand by the St. Louis platform. My answer was to him something like t is, that the republican platform adopted at St. Louis is like a man that without a foundation built a house upon the earth against which the storm did beat vehemently and immediately it fell and the ruin of that house was great, while the silver democratic party adopted a platform at Chicago which is like a man who built a house and digged deep and laid the foundation on a rock, and when the flood arose, the storm beat against that house and could not shake it for it was founded on a rock. Now Mr. Editor a few words more and I am through. Whatever the howling may be over, the free silver men in DeKalb county, Butler township will roll out 70 majority for our honorable and noble William Jenings Bryan, November 3d.

From Spencerville,

SPECIAL TO THE COURIER:—Spencerville against the world. Ora Spitler and Gus. Cupp caught two pickerel in the river this morning, weighing 28 lbs. How is that for fish: One weighed about a pound more than the other. Now some of you scholars figure out the weight of each. The same men went fishing yesterday and caught 25 lbs. Why go to Michigan for fish, while the old St. Joe runs along our borders?

Auburn Singers.

The Ft. Wayne Journal in its write-up of the big Bryan rally, pays this compliment to the Auburn Free Silver Glee Club: "While waiting for the arrival of Senator Teller the audience was kept in good humor and the tedium of waiting was relieved by the Auburn Free Silver Glee club, composed of Messrs. W. B. Brown, Will Warrick, E. H. Bottenburg, and George Quince. After they had rendered one inspiriting campaign song their popularity was established. They wrought the crowd up to a high pitch of enthusiasm and they were encored again and again until the arrival of Senator Teller and party.

J. E. Pomeroy Esq.

Dear Sir:—Following is one of the reasons I think the "Wilson Law" passed by a Democratic Congress is a better law than the "McKinley Law" passed by a Republican Congress or any high protection law. These figures may be found on page 63 of circular No. 123 of a report of the U. S.

Excess of Revenue over Expenditure of the Government at the close of each fiscal year ending June 30 from 1888 to the present time.

Exc. of Rev. over Ex.	1888	111 341 273
" " " " "	1889	87 761 080
" " " " "	1890	85 040 271
" " " " "	1891	26 838 541
" " " " "	1892	9 914 453
" " " " "	1893	2 341 674
Exc. of Ex. over Rev.	1894	69 803 260
" " " " "	1895	42 805 223
" " " " "	1896	25 203 245

The so called McKinley law took effect in Oct. 1890 and during the year 1891 following there was a decrease of Revenue over expenditure from 85 million to only 26 million. Also during the fiscal year closing 1894 you will see that the expenditure exceeded the revenue by $69,803,260 while the expenses of the Government were $16,952,774 less than the preceding year, and when the Wilson law took effect the government began to cut down the excess of expense over Revenue the first year from $69,803-260 to $42,805,223 and the second year to $25,203,245.

A Wife Equal to a Cold Miss!

Will some of your readers give me a good receipt for making a cold starch? I am selling self-heating flat irons and iron a little at every house and have to use some starch every place and want to know how to make a good cold starch. My husband was in debt and I being anxious to help him thought I would sell self-heating flat irons and I am doing splendidly. A cent's worth of fuel will even heat. You can iron in half the time and no danger of scorching the clothes as with the old iron, and you can get the most beautiful gloss. I sell at nearly every house, as the iron saves so much fuel everybody wants one. I make $1.50 on each iron and have not sold less than ten any day I worked. My brother is doing well and I think anyone can make lots of money anywhere selling irons. J. P. CASTY & Co, St. Louis, Mo., will start anyone in the business, as they did me; if you will address them. MRS. A. RUSSELL.

VICTORY IN SIGHT!

The Beginning of the End Is Now at Hand.

CAMPAIGN CLOSING.

Triumphant Canvass of William J. Bryan.

In These Hardest of Hard Times the People Have Resisted Temptation and Nobly Refused to Barter Away Their Liberties for Mark Hanna's Pottage—Republicans Have Abandoned States One by One Until They Already Practically Admit that Their Cause Is Lost.

The beginning of the end is at hand. Wall street's effort to make this a government of money instead of a government of men will fail, and so signal will be its defeat that not within the lifetime of any child now living will plutocracy dare to lift its head as a separate force in American politics. The people have been called upon, during a period of almost unprecedented hard times, to resist temptation, and nobly they have met the issue. They have refused to barter away their liberties for Mark Hanna's pottage, and now, almost upon the eve of battle, they are lined up for the conflict as uncorrupted as the soldiery of Sparta, as incorruptible as the patriots of Valley Forge.

From the date of William Jennings Bryan's nomination to this good hour he has grown steadily in the esteem of his fellow citizens. He has made no mistakes; he has dickered with no faction and has fearlessly refused to temporize on any question. Every voter knows where he stands, and all men who have studied his character believe that his purpose is as fixed as the northern star.

Immediately after the convention which nominated him "he threw his shining lance full and fair against the enemies of his country and the defamers of her honor, and he is to-day a total stranger to defeat." An American to the core, he believes in the destiny of this great nation, and does not believe that it requires the indorsement of a Rothschild or a Morgan to make her obligations good. A man of fixedness of purpose, he stands to-day where he has always stood—for the money of the constitution.

Knowing the law, and daring to uphold it, he opposes trusts and combines, and his election will be quickly followed by the dissolution, under process of law, of every organization whose purpose it is to restrain trade and bleed the people.

McKinley is also an American, but he has yet to learn the A B C of patriotism, for he has (to place the most charitable construction on his recent change of heart) come to the conclusion that this people cannot "coin money and regulate the value thereof," as declared in the constitution, without England's consent. McKinley has no fixedness of purpose, as is shown by his record on the money question, and his attitude toward the trusts is notoriously against the people.

At the outset the Republicans claimed everything. They were not only going to carry all the States of the Atlantic seaboard, the middle west, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri and Louisiana, but they promised their candidate the electoral vote of Texas. These promises were based on Mark Hanna's money bags, and not on the then trend of sentiment throughout the United States. Slowly but surely it dawned upon the Republican boss and his subordinates that the American people were not cattle, and that they could not be bought.

Texas was abandoned as something of a joke; Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri were left to their fate in the effort to save Ohio, and to-day, after all their boasting, they admit that without Illinois their cause is lost. Illinois will cast her vote for Bryan. As Illinois goes so will go the election. If the election should be held to-morrow the Democratic ticket would be elected by a tremendous majority, and every day between now and Nov. 3 will give it lustier strength. Victory is in sight.—Chicago Dispatch.

Couldn't Corner Bryan.

A voice: "How about free trade?"

Mr. Bryan: "Free trade? Did you say that? (Laughter.) Do you believe in protection?"

A voice: "I don't know."

Mr. Bryan: "Well, if you don't know you are a mighty good man to be at this meeting. I will tell you about the tariff question. If the men who want protection will join with me in putting a prohibitory duty on foreign financial policies, I will discuss the rest of the tariff schedule with them. (Great applause.) Or, I will tell you, if you are not willing to do that, I will wait until after they settle the money question by international agreement, and then we will submit the tariff question to international agreement. (Great applause and cheers.) In this campaign a Democratic free trader and a Democratic tariff reformer like John G. Carlisle can help elect a Republican like Mr. McKinley, and when that is possible in them, the protectionists and tariff reformers who believe in free silver can unite and settle the money question, and we will settle the tariff question afterward.

"Now, my friends, if you want relief you have got to elect a—(A voice: "William J. Bryan. That's what we're going to do.") Of course you'll do that, my friends. I was not meaning to express any doubt on that subject. But I say that if you want financial relief you have got to see that the three branches of government join in the demand for it."—Bryan at Saginaw, Mich.

Sensible Suggestions.

In the Milwaukee News a farmer makes the following sensible suggestions: The gold is cornered, it is in the hands of a few—the bankers and the money loaners. Of the $4,000,000,000 of gold in the world it is said that the Rothschild family control about $2,500,000,000 of it. This leaves $1,500,000,000 for the other grabbers. It is the policy of those holding the gold to make everything cheap in terms of gold, a thing they can easily accomplish while the gold standard is maintained. Give us free coinage of both silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 and the spell will be broken. The debtor can pay his debt in the honest dollar he borrowed. Prices, wages and employment will again be restored, and we will have no dollar whose bullion value is worth more or less than 100 cents.

"BRYAN HAS LEFT AN UGLY TRAIL."

Yes, and Hanna's "Dust" Will Never Cover It Up.—Chicago Dispatch.

Would Open Industries.

The mining regions of the West cover nearly one-half of the area of the United States and have produced since 1849 in gold and silver $3,000,000,000 without any perceptible diminution in supply. The ore in a great majority of the mines is mixed gold and silver. Where gold predominates, it is called a gold mine, and when there is more of the white metal it is called a silver mine. Every miner working underground gives employment to ten men in contributory industries on the surface, hence an additional working force of 50,000 men engaged in getting out ore, timbering the levels and doing development work would sustain half a million in the smelters, lumbering transportation, building, trades merchandising, and so forth.

Yes, You Will, Lauterbach.

The city of New York has served notice through one of its favorite orators that the election of Bryan will not be tamely submitted to. Edward Lauterbach, chairman of the Republican County Committee of the city of New York, gave voice to the traitorous sentiment, and the fact that he was not thrown into North River is conclusive proof that his audience was more or less in sympathy with him.

His language was explicit and capable of but one construction. Referring to the probable triumph of Democracy he said (as reported by a shorthand writer present): "We will not abide by that decision." The next day, after he had been brought to book, not by the Republican leaders, but by the only Democratic newspaper on the island, he modified his language so that it now reads, "We may not abide by that decision."

We hasten to assure Mr. Lauterbach that he and his cronies may and will; there is nothing more certain under the sun than Mr. Lauterbach's absolute acquiescence, even if he has to be knocked on the head or shot through the heart to make him tractable.

The people of the United States permitted one usurper to occupy the White House during a period of four years, but he was the first and last of his ilk. If Mr. Bryan gets the votes—and he will get them—the people who vote for him will seat him.

Furthermore, it would perhaps be conducive to the health of men of the Lauterbach stripe if they would keep their treasonable sentiments to themselves. In a republic like ours it is impossible to exile a traitor until he commits some overt act, but if he become a nuisance the people will probably find some way to abate him.—Chicago Dispatch.

MANIFESTO OF CHAIRMAN JONES.

To the American People—In view of the fact that the great corporations with scarcely an exception and many of the large employers of labor in the United States are engaged in a concerted effort to coerce their employes into voting at the approaching election against their own convictions, I deem it my duty to call upon all those who believe in the supremacy of the law and the untrammeled freedom of the individual in the right of exercising the ballot to use their utmost efforts to prevent the success of this most flagrant act of lawlessness, for if this conspiracy succeed government by corporations will have succeeded government by the people.

"Corporations have no powers except those conferred specifically in the laws creating them. The right to coerce voters, or to interfere with American citizens in the exercise of their rights at the ballot box, are not named in any of these acts of incorporation, and when corporations undertake to exercise such powers they become law breakers, and the good of society demands that they be rebuked and punished. During the present contest, which involves questions of the utmost moment to the American people, thousands of men have been compelled by fear of losing their places to join clubs and march in processions in behalf of a cause they detest. Requests from corporation bosses to vote the Republican ticket, which are perfectly understood to convey a threat of discharge in case of refusal, are made every day to men who dare not resent the insult.

"The corporations which thus appeal to force and fraud strike at the very foundation of republican government, and the lovers of free institutions must arouse themselves to save the country from its great peril.

"Especially should the workingmen assert their manhood rights. If they vote their convictions and in accordance with their interests the Democratic ticket is certain of election, and in that case the employing corporations will have no desire to embark upon a policy of punishment. On the contrary, they will be eager to conciliate employes who will have behind them in assertion of their rights the vast powers of a federal administration in sympathy with those who toil. But should they submit to coercion and elect an administration that will be the creature of the corporations and moneyed interest of the country, those workingmen whose entire submissiveness is regarded with suspicion will find themselves replaced by men who can be depended upon to vote as they are told. In the contest that is raging the salvation of the workingman lies in the assertion at the polls of his rights as a free and independent American citizen.

"The perpetration of this attempted outrage upon free suffrage will work its own cure. An indignant people, jealous of their rights, will demand that the Legislatures, State and national, shall proceed at once by rigorous measures to prevent the possibility of a repetition of such attempts hereafter.

"While the metropolitan press, with a few honorable exceptions, is under the domination of those incorporated conspirators, and is basely subservient to their wishes, the country newspapers, as a rule, remain undebauched, and are still in sympathy with the principles of government established by Washington and Jefferson, and illustrated and maintained by Jackson and Lincoln. They will 'cry out and spare not' until such legislation is had as will prevent another such shameful attempt at abuse of power.

"In the meantime, the success of the present conspiracy must be prevented. The pending contest is already won by an overwhelming majority, if the honest sentiments of the people are permitted to find free expression at the polls—and this the people are ready to have at any cost.

"The national committee appreciates the need of vigilence. It has taken steps to impress upon the people, and especially upon every Democratic election officer, the great importance of scrutinizing the marks upon every ballot and of carefully watching every act at or about the polls to make sure that no judge or clerk of election shall have an opportunity to betray the secrets of the ballot, if he would.

"And the national committee, backed by the full power of the Democratic organization in every State of the union, pledges itself that every scoundrel, whether public officer or private citizen, who is detected in any violation of the law, shall be vigorously prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary if possible.

"JAMES K. JONES,
"Chairman Democratic National Committee."

THE TWO PLANS.

The Democratic Plan.

If Bryan and bimetallism win the mixed gold-silver mines of the West would immediately commence operations and employ directly or indirectly, at least 500,000 men, affording a comfortable support to five million people. That the activity in mining would create a large home market for manufactured goods of all kinds, and for the farm products of the middle West, and that the increased traffic on the railroads would call for the services of all skilled men not now at work. The American deposits of the precious metals are the richest and most extensive in the world. Why not dig needed money from our mines and employ surplus labor? It costs nothing for interest and competes with no other industry. Protectionists who are sincere must see that this is the best way to start factories which are in need of more customers rather than more tariff. The Republicans confess by their anxiety to import gold that the country needs more money to be prosperous. The expected thousand million dollars if supplied by our own mines would absorb their output at present rate for ten years. Are the farmers and workingmen going to miss this opportunity to better their condition? Will they permit the election to be carried in favor of more bonds and more debt to England through the expenditure of a vast corruption fund contributed by the Wall street bankers, in order to perpetuate their monopoly of the money supply?

The Republican Plan.

The Republicans say that if McKinley and the gold standard wins, a thousand million dollars of English gold (mined in South Africa) will be invested in the United States, and that this borrowed money will bring good times. The country is now threatened with bankruptcy because of its enormous foreign debt and the great drain of money to London to pay the interest. The Republican idea is to borrow more money and pay more interest as a cure to the evil. Consider for a moment that this influx of gold benefits no one except the Wall street bankers, who make big commissions on the loans. It does not give employment to a single additional man. It promises no advance in prices to the farmer on his products, without which it is useless to expect prosperity either to the laborers or the business men.

Political Notes.

Men against money. Men will win.

Let there be no doubt about Indiana. Bryan has literally set it on fire with enthusiasm.

Bryan was not satisfied with Bynum's scalp in Indiana. He took Ben Harrison's also.

Bob Ingersoll probably opposes the silver dollar because it bears the inscription, "In God we trust."

Has any one yet heard a Bryan man say that if McKinley is elected "We will not abide by that decision."

That storm along the Atlantic coast was probably a trade wind setting this way in anticipation of Bryan's election.

"We will put American manhood against all their corruption fund with confidence in the issue."—William J. Bryan.

Do not overlook the fact that President Bryan's hands will be tied without a free silver Congress is elected to support his policy.

When corporation influence is cast for a ticket of any kind, it may be accepted as a fact by the people, that the corporations intend to control the nominess on that ticket.

The result in Illinois has never been doubtful, but events are so shaping themselves as to give Bryan a larger majority than his most enthusiastic supporters ever claimed for him.

And now some one says there is a surprising familiarity about the faces of the men who appear at Canton one day as puddlers and the next as glass blowers and the next as wool combers, and so on. Can these things be?

Men have been hanged for offenses less grave than that of Edward Lauterbach, chairman of the New York Republican Committee, who asserted in a public speech that if Bryan be elected the goldbugs may not tamely submit to the decision of the people at the polls.

Minnesota and the Northwest is giving Bryan a most enthusiastic reception. Indeed, it is difficult to say which section of the country has given him the most cordial welcome. If the people vote as they cheer the silver nominee will go into the White House by the laregst electoral and popular majority ever given in this country.

When it comes to his silver record McKinley has a good forgettery.

By this time next year America's financial system will be deforeignized.

This is a fight of the people against the plutocrats, the "bourse against the blouse," overalls against obligarchy.

It will be noticed that very few Republican orators are "pointing with pride" to their currency record.

Coercion is cowardly, criminal and contemptible, and it is affording the Republicans an opportunity to make another alliterative and losing campaign.

FAMED FOR QUALITY.

MICHIGAN PEACHES CARRY OFF THE PALM FOR FLAVOR.

Have Been Cheap and Very Plentiful This Season—Millions of Baskets Shipped to Chicago for Packing and Distribution.

A Luscious Fruit.

Every time Chicago sits down to breakfast in the peach season, says the Chronicle, the yield of half a hundred acres of Michigan peaches is consumed, and the country west, rolling up a proportionate average, helps to pay off that vast army of pickers, packers, carters, vesselmen, teamsters, commission merchants and basket makers who, since early in July, have been part and parcel of the millions of the famous peach belt of the Wolverine State. From Berrien County north, a broad band ten miles in width along the shores of Lake Michigan is the favored fruit center, and all this territory, with its millions of acres, is devoted to supplying the Western markets with fruits and vegetables of various kinds, with peaches far in the lead as an edible, out of which many handsome fortunes have been made by intelligent growers. The present year has been a banner one for this interest. More peaches have been shipped than in any previous season, for several days of one week some 20,000 bushels arriving in Chicago regularly, notwithstanding the fact that the best varieties dropped from $5 to $1.75 per bushel, and that thousands of 1-5 bushel baskets brought less than 9 cents apiece.

Michigan peaches begin coming as early as the first week in July, and shipments continue until snow flies. Nearly all of them are sent by boat, and a morning scene in the Chicago peach docks is often enlivened by the arrival of a steamer carrying as high as 70,000 bushels of the fruit. The moment these arrive a hundred stout-armed men march in single file down a gangplank, and, threading the baskets in half-dozens, convey them to as many waiting cars. They are hurried to the great commission marts of the city, and the big steamer puffs its way back to St. Joseph for another load, to keep busy the odd 3,000 men who are engaged daily during the season about the various loading and unloading docks.

There is a profit in raising peaches, notwithstanding the price fluctuations of the season, and fruit growers in such favored localities as Benton Harbor, where transportation facilities are superior, are exceedingly prosperous and satisfied. Here is located the largest peach farm in Michigan, and that means in the world. It is owned by Rolland Morrill, president of the Michigan State Horticultural Society, and he has made a fortune out of it. It is about five miles from Benton Harbor, and contains 300 acres, 100 acres of which are devoted exclusively to peaches, meaning a yearly yield of 50,000 bushels. Ten acres is devoted to a late variety, known as the Golden Drop, which has yielded $10,000 clear profit within five years, being, therefore, most appropriately named. Other great farms are being yearly opened, one of which, owned by the West Michigan Nursery Company, will contain 800 acres, and eclipse even the Morrill farm as soon as the trees begin to bear.

Thirty years about cover the history of the peach industry in Berrien County, for it was not until 1860 that orchards of any size were set out in the vicinity of Benton Harbor and St. Joseph. The pioneers soon had fruit-bearing land up to $1,000 an acre. The year 1868 marked the appearance of such diseases as "blotches" and "yellows" among the peaches, spreading until five years later not a peach orchard of any size was left in Berrien County. Orchards which had been worth fortunes were set back on a general produce-bearing basis of value. The peach industry was dead, and not until ten years ago did a revival come. The disease gradually lost its hold, and Berrien County is now the banner peach district of Michigan.

Naturally, the peach tree is a sloven. It will grow out of shape in one season if left to itself. To correct this the grower goes over his orchard every spring, cutting off just half of every twig which grew the season before. In another respect the peach tree is very troublesome. It undertakes more than it can accomplish in fruit bearing. It overloads itself, and the first work of the grower is to thin his peaches. On an average it costs $17 an acre to do this work. No skill is needed for it, and the Michigan tramp has the reputation of doing the work. Provided with a step-ladder, he goes over every limb, flipping off the fruit, as nearly as possible leaving the peaches four inches apart on the twigs. This is done just before the pits begin to harden in the green fruit.

First of Berrien County peaches comes the "Lewis seedling," one of the most popular varieties. It is of medium size, red-coated and having white meat. The Crawford peach is another favorite, and is of a golden yellow; the "Stumps" peach, beautifully marked, with a white meat, is profitable, but of them all the "Elberta" peach is king. Just now it is on the market, large as an ordinary teacup, blotched with brilliant red, and on the under side yellow as gold. It brings the top price of the market, the wholesaler in Chicago paying $1 for seventy-two picked peaches.

THE STREET MARKET FOR PEACHES IN BENTON HARBOR.

Peaches in Berrien County are nearer perfection than they have ever been, and to maintain this perfection orchards are watched for the first sign of deterioration. No tree that is unhealthy is allowed to cumber the ground. The dreaded yellows have given way before this scrutiny, and even if no State inspector were going the rounds of Michigan orchards the yellows would have little chance to spread, for no progressive farmer would let a suspected tree stand for an hour after it had been noticed.

The foundation of a peach orchard is the nursery, in which pits from the peach orchards of Tennessee are planted. At one year old these seedling shoots are taken up and set out in the orchards in squares of twenty feet, giving 108 trees to the acre. In the following spring they are ready for budding. Buds are taken from bearing trees which have demonstrated the quality of their fruit. A branch is cut from the tree, and from this branch a bit of bark is cut in the shape of a dagger's blade, carrying with it just one leaf bud. With a pointed knife a perpendicular slit is cut in the bark of the seedling, almost at the ground. This slit is about an inch long and at the top of it, at right angles, another cut is made through the bark, extending a quarter of an inch on each side of the perpendicular slit. Into this cross cut the point of the dagger-like piece of bark is thrust and pushed downward until it is snugly housed by the loosened bark, leaving only the bud protruding. On each side of this bud the bark of the seedling is wrapped and in a few weeks the incisions have healed, leaving the bud growing.

The year following the budding process the pruner passes through the young orchard and cuts away the whole top of the seedling, just above the shoot from the bud, and the bud's growth is thinned to one straight shoot. At one year old this shoot will produce peaches. They are not allowed to grow, however, but are pulled off before the pits in the fruit begin to harden. The next year they are allowed to bear a few peaches, in the third year they bear a few more, and in the fourth year the orchard is paying profits to the grower. After this year nothing else is grown in the orchard, but from May 1 to Aug. 15, twice a week, the ground is stirred by a "weeder," which loosens the soil to the depth of an inch or more. A man with one horse and this "weeder" cultivates twenty-five acres a day on an average. Between crops bonedust and potash are sown broadcast over the ground, the influences of which are manifest directly in the fruit, showing juiciness and color.

GATHERING THE PEACHES.
(Scene in R. Morrel's Peach Farm, the Largest in Michigan.)

MORNING SCENE ON THE PEACH DOCKS IN CHICAGO.

Discovered by Chance.

Professor Roentgen's discovery of the photographic power of the kathode rays was due to an accident. In experimenting with a Crookes tube through which a strong current was passing, but which was covered with a cloth, he happened to bring his hand between the tube and some sensitized photographic paper. Finding lines on the paper for which he could not account, he hunted for the cause, and found that the bones of his hand had been reproduced by the rays from the tube. In repeating his experiments recently before the Emperor William, the Wurzburg professor explained that he had not yet solved the theory of the phenomenon, and called the rays provisionally X-rays. In the first experiments the rays did not produce objects hidden by solid matter thicker than one inch, but since then Roentgen is said to have obtained pictures taken through aluminum plates a centimeter and a half thick, and also through two sets of books, and at Pesth parts of the human body larger than the hand have been taken.

There is no doubt about the genuineness of the phenomena discovered. Roentgen's photographs have been examined by Professor Boltzmann, of Vienna, who says the discovery opens up a new epoch in the history of science. The experiments have been repeated successfully, with the same results, by Professor Klupathy, at Budapesth, Domalip, at Prague; Pfandler and Czermak, at Gratz, and in London. Roentgen says that not only are the X-rays not refracted by glass lenses or prisms, or in passing through water, but that they have no influence on the most sensitive magnetic instruments, and develop no heat.

Economic Value of Birds.

The economic value of birds is untold. This fact might be placed beyond dispute if it were possible to prepare two tables—one showing how many wire worms it would take to destroy a mile of turnips, how many grubs to ravage the wheat harvests of a dozen farms, how many insects to strip the leafy blades of a forest hare, how many to spoil the fruits of wide orchards, and the other recording the fact that these very numbers of insects are eaten by a few humble birds in the course of the year. That the result would be conclusive evidence of the birds' value may be safely foretold by a glance at a few facts which have already been brought to bear upon the question.

In the spring, when there are clamorous young birds in the nest, the house sparrow returns every three or four minutes, each time bearing spoils in the shape of insect food. Calculated at its lowest possible value—that is, allowing only one insect to each journey—this thankless task represents tens of thousands of captured insects as the work of one pair of birds in one month. Swift fliers like the swallow that hawk for food in the air may rank higher. They slay hundreds of thousands.

Unusual Surgical Operation.

A quite novel surgical operation has successfully been performed at Parma, Italy, by Professor Camillo Verdelli, in the presence of all the physicians of the Parmese hospital and with very satisfactory results. The new operation was the washing of the heart. It was the first operation of the kind and Professor Verdelli employed the washing apparatus recently invented by Professor Riva. After making an operative incision Professor Verdelli first cleaned the pericardium of the patient, a 12-year-old boy, of the pus which had accumulated thereon, and then proceeded to wash the heart with a strong solution of soda biborate (borax). The operation was very successful, inasmuch as no further complication has arisen. The boy is now doing very well and is on his way to complete recovery. Professor Vardelli has received numerous congratulations for his success with the new operation from surgeons all over Europe.

The Hindoo and the Letter.

An Indian servant was once sent by his master to a friend's house some distance away. He had to carry with him four loaves of bread and a letter. Being hungry, the Indian ate one of the loaves. When he reached his destination and handed in the letter, with only three loaves, his theft was, of course, instantly discovered, and, the circumstances being reported to his master, he was flogged.

Some time after he was sent again with loaves and a note. Rightly guessing that the mysterious paper had told of his misconduct the last time, the Indian on this journey carefully hid the letter under a large stone, so that it could not see him. Then he once more ate a loaf, chuckling to think how he was cheating the tell-tale paper. Judge of his amazement when he was found out again, all through the wonderful letter. He confessed his theft, and told how he had tried to cheat the paper, but it was too clever for him.

Odors of Plants.

The odors of plants reside in different parts of them—sometimes in the roots, as in the iris and vitivert; the leaves in mint, patchouly, and thyme; the stem or wood in cedar and santal; the flower in the roses and violets; the seeds in the tonquin bean and caraway; the bark in cinnamon, etc. Some plants yield more than one odor, which are quite distinct and charactistic. The orange tree, for instance, gives three—from the leaves one called petit grain, from the flowers neroli, and from the rind of the fruit essential oil of orange. The fragrance or odor of plants is owing in nearly all cases to a volatile oil, either contained in small vessels or sacs within them, or generated from time to time during their life, as when in blossom. Some few exude by incision odoriferous gums—as benzoin, myrrh, etc.; others give, by the same act, what are called balsams, which appear to be mixtures of an odorous oil and inodorous gum.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

WHEN I HAVE TIME.

When I have time, so many things I'll do
To make life happier and more fair
For those whose lives are crowded now with care.
I'll help to lift them from their low despair,
When I have time.

When I have time, the friend I love so well
Shall know no more these weary, toiling days;
I'll lead her feet in pleasant paths always,
And cheer her heart with words of sweetest praise,
When I have time.

When you have time! The friend you hold so dear
May be beyond the reach of all your sweet intent;
May never know that you so kindly meant
To fill her life with sweet content,
When you had time.

Now is the time! Ah, friend, no longer wait
To scatter loving smiles and words of cheer
To those around whose lives are now so dear.
They may not meet you in the coming year—
Now is the time.

THE HELMET.

"But, uncle, I love my cousin."

"Get out!"

"Give her to me!"

"Don't bother me!"

"It will be my death!"

"Nonsense! You'll console yourself with some other girl."

"Pray——"

My uncle, whose back had been toward me, whirled around, his face was red to bursting, and brought his closed fist down upon the counter with a heavy thump.

"Never!" he cried; "never! Do you hear what I say?"

And as I looked at him beseechingly and with joined hands he went on:

"A pretty husband you look like! Without a sou and dreaming of going into housekeeping! A nice mess I should make of it by giving you my daughter! It's no use your insisting. You know that when I have said 'No' nothing under the sun can make me say 'Yes!'"

I ceased to make any further appeal. I knew my uncle—about as headstrong an old fellow as could be found in a day's search. I contented myself with giving vent to a deep sigh, and then went on with the furbishing of a big double-handed sword, rusty from point to hilt.

This memorable conversation took place, in fact, in the shop of my maternal uncle, a well-known dealer in antiquities and objets d'art, 53 Rue des Claquettes, at the sign of the "Maltese Cross"—a perfect museum of curiosities.

The walls were hung with Marseilles and old Rouen china, facing ancient cuirasses, sabers and muskets and picture frames; below these were arranged old cabinets, coffers of all sorts and statues of saints, one-armed or one-legged for the most part and dilapidated as to their gilding; then, here and there, in glass cases, hermetically closed and locked, there were knickknacks in infinite variety—lachrymatories, tiny urns, rings, precious stones, fragments of marble, bracelets, crosses, necklaces, medals and miniature ivory statuettes, the yellow tints of which in the sun took momentarily a fleshlike transparency.

Time out of mind the shop had belonged to the Coduberts. It passed regularly from father to son, and my uncle—his neighbors said—could not but be the possessor of a nice little fortune. Held in esteem by all, a municipal councillor, impressed by the importance and gravity of his office, short, fat, highly choleric and headstrong, but at bottom not in the least degree an unkind sort of man—such was my uncle Corubert, my only living male relative, who as soon as I left school had elevated me to the dignity of chief and only clerk and shopman of the "Maltese Cross."

But my uncle was not only a dealer in antiquities and a municipal councillor, he was yet more, and above all, the father of my cousin Rose, with whom I was naturally in love.

To come back to the point at which I digressed.

Without paying any attention to the sighs which exhaled from my bosom while scouring the rust from my long, two-handed sword, my uncle, magnifying glass in hand, was engaged in the examination of a lot of medals which he had purchased that morning. Suddenly he raised his head; 5 o'clock was striking.

"The council!" he cried.

When my uncle pronounced that august word it made a mouthful; for a pin he would have saluted it bareheaded. But this time, after a moment's consideration, he tapped his forehead and added, in a tone of supreme relief:

"No, the sitting does not take place before to-morrow—and I am forgetting that I have to go to the railway station to get the consignment of which I was advised this morning."

Rising from his seat and lying down his glass, he called out:

"Rose, give me my cane and hat!"

Then, turning toward me, he added, in a lower tone and speaking very quickly:

"As to you—don't forget our conversation. If you think you can make me say 'Yes,' try it!—but don't think you'll succeed. Meanwhile, not a word to Rose, or, by St. Barthelemy, my patron of happy memory, I'll instantly kick you out of doors!"

At that moment Rose appeared with my uncle's cane and hat, which she handed to him. He kissed her on the forehead; then, giving me a last but eloquent look, hurried from the shop.

I went on scouring my double-handed sword. Rose came quietly toward me.

"What is the matter with my father?" she asked. "He seems to be angry with you."

I looked at her—her eyes were so black, her look so kind, her mouth so rosy and her teeth so white that I told her all—my love, my suit to her father and his rough refusal. I could not help it—after all, it was his fault. He was not there; I determined to brave his anger. Besides, there is nobody like timid persons for displaying courage under certain circumstances.

My cousin said nothing; she only held down her eyes—while her cheeks were as red as those of cherries in May.

I checked myself.

"Are you angry with me?" I asked tremblingly. "Are you angry with me, Rose?"

She held out to me her hand. On that, my heart seething with audacity, my head on fire, I cried:

"Rose—I swear it! I will be your husband!" And as she shook her head and looked at me sadly I added: "Oh, I well know that my uncle is self-willed, but I will be more self-willed still; and, since he must be forced to say 'Yes,' I will force him to say it."

"But how?" asked Rose.

Ah! how? That was exactly the difficulty. But, no matter; I would find a way to surmount it.

At that moment a heavy step resounded in the street. Instinctively we moved away from each other; I returned to my double-handed sword and Rose, to keep herself in countenance, set to dusting with a corner of her apron a little statuette in its faded red velvet case.

My uncle entered. Surprised at finding us together, he stopped short and looked sharply from one to the other.

We each of us went on rubbing without raising our heads.

"Here, take this," said my uncle, handing me a bulky parcel from under his arm. "A splendid purchase, you'll see."

The subject did not interest me in the least.

I opened the parcel and from the enveloping paper emerged a steel helmet—but not an ordinary helmet, oh, no—a superb, a monumental morion, with gorget and pointed visor of strange form. The visor was raised and I tried to discover what prevented it from being lowered.

"It will not go down—the hinges have got out of order," said my uncle, "but it's a superb piece, and when it has been thoroughly cleaned and touched up will look well—that shall be your to-morrow's job."

"Very good, uncle," I murmured, not daring to raise my eyes to his.

That night, on returning to my room, I at once went to bed. I was eager to be alone and able to think at my ease. Night brings counsel, it is said, and I had great need that the proverb should prove true. But after lying awake for an hour without receiving any assistance I fell to sleep and till next morning did nothing but dream the oddest dreams. I saw Rose on her way to church in a strange bridal costume, a fourteenth century cap three feet high on her head, but looking prettier than ever. Then suddenly the scene changed to moonlight, in which innumerable helmets and pieces of old china were dancing a wild farandole, while my uncle, clad in complete armor and with a formidable halberd in his hand, conducted the bewildering whirl.

The next day—ah! the next day!—I was no nearer. In vain, with clenched teeth, I scoured the immense helmet brought by my uncle the previous evening—scoured it with such fury as almost to break the iron; not an idea came to me. The helmet shone like a sun. My uncle sat smoking his pipe and watching me, but I could think of nothing—of no way of forcing him to give me his daughter.

At 3 o'clock Rose went into the country, whence she was not to return until dinner time, in the evening. On the threshold she could only make a sign to me with her hand; my uncle had not left us alone for a single instant. He was not easy in his mind; I could see that by his face. No doubt he had not forgotten our conversation of the previous evening.

I went on rubbing at my helmet.

"You have made it quite bright enough—put it down," said my uncle.

I put it down. The storm was gathering; I could not do better than allow it to blow over.

But suddenly, as if overtaken by a strange fancy, my uncle took up the enormous morion and turned and examined it on all sides.

"A handsome piece of armor, there is no doubt about it; but it must have weighed pretty heavily on its wearer's shoulders," he muttered; and, urged by I know not what demon, he clapped it on his head and latched the gorget piece about his neck.

Struck almost speechless, I watched what he was doing—thinking only how ugly he looked.

Suddenly there was a sharp sound—as if a spring had snapped—and—crack!—down fell the visor; and there was my uncle, with his head in an iron cage, gesticulating and swearing like a pagan.

I could contain myself no longer, and burst into a roar of laughter; for my uncle, stumpy, fat and rubicund, presented an irresistibly comic appearance.

Threateningly he came toward me.

"The hinges!—the hinges, fool!" he yelled.

I could not see his face, but I felt that it was red to bursting.

"When you have done laughing, idiot!" he cried.

But the helmet swayed so oddly on his shoulders, his voice came from out it in such strange tones, that the more he gesticulated, the more he yelled and threatened me, the louder I laughed.

At that moment the clock of the Hotel de Ville striking 5 o'clock was heard.

"The municipal council!" murmured my uncle, in a stifled voice. "Quick, help me off with this beast of a machine! We'll settle our business afterward!"

But, suddenly likewise, an idea—a wild, extraordinary idea—came into my head; but then, whoever is madder than a lover? Besides, I had no choice of means.

"No!" I replied.

My uncle fell back two paces in terror—and again the enormous helmet wabbled on his shoulders.

"No," I repeated firmly; "I'll not help you out unless you give me the hand of my cousin Rose!"

From the depths of the strangely elongated visor came, not an angry exclamation, but a veritable roar. I had "done it."—I had burned my ships.

"If you do not consent to do what I ask of you," I added, "not only will I not help you off with your helmet, but I will call in all your neighbors, and then go and find the municipal council!"

"You'll end your days on the scaffold!" cried my uncle.

"The hand of Rose!" I repeated. "You told me that it would only be by force that you would be made to say 'yes'—say it, or I will call in the neighbors."

The clock was still striking; my uncle raised his arms as if to curse me.

"Decide at once," I cried, "somebody is coming!"

"Well, then—yes!" murmured my uncle. "But make haste!"

"On your word of honor?"

"On my word of honor."

The visor gave way, the gorge piece also, and my uncle's head issued from durance, red as a poppy.

Just in time. The chemist at the corner, a colleague in the municipal council, entered the shop.

"Are you coming?" he asked; "they will be beginning the business without us."

"I'm coming," replied my uncle.

And, without looking at me, he took up his hat and cane and hurried out.

The next moment all my hopes had vanished. My uncle would surely not forgive me.

At dinner time I took my place at table on his right hand, in low spirits, ate little and said nothing.

"It will come with the dessert," I thought.

Rose looked at me, and I avoided meeting her eyes. As I had expected, the dessert over, my uncle lit his pipe, raised his head and then——

Rose went to him.

"Do you know what that fellow there asked me to do yesterday?"

I trembled like a leaf and Rose did the same.

"To give him your hand," he added. "Do you love him?"

Rose cast down her eyes.

"Very well," continued my uncle, "on this side the case is complete. Come here, you."

I approached.

"Here I am, uncle," and, in a whisper, I added quickly, "Forgive me!"

He burst into a hearty laugh.

"Marry her, then, donkey—since you love her and I give her to you!"

"Ah!—uncle!"

"Ah!—dear papa!"

And Rose and I threw ourselves into his arms.

"Very good! very good!" he cried, wiping his eyes. "Be happy; that's all I ask."

And, in turn, he whispered in my ear:

"I should have given her to you, all the same, you big goose; but—keep the story of the helmet between us two!"

I give my word that I have never told it but to Rose, my dear little wife. And if ever you pass along the Rue des Claquettes, 5, at the place of honor in the old shop, I'll show you my uncle's helmet, which we would never sell.—Strand Magazine.

RODE INSIDE THE COWCATCHER.

Novel Journey of a Tramp in the State of Washington.

The man who rode in a cowcatcher bids fair to become a hero among the knights of the road, as well as a marvel to railroad men. His name is William Errixson and his years are 20—twenty years as replete with adventure as a chapter out of a dime novel. Beating his way over hundreds of miles of territory has become second nature to him, and a trip on a brakebeam is a positive luxury.

But wherein William Errixson has transcended all the feats of the migrating hobo is that he was the first and only individual of his kind to conceive and execute the audacious project of caging himself within a cowcatcher and beating a ride in that perilous and essentially melodramatic situation. It was thus that he traveled from Winnemucca to Wadsworth. He had to be careful in selecting his locomotive to find one that had no forward steam exhaust. He has some knowledge of locomotives, and so was able to pick out one with only side exhausts. Inside of the cowcatcher there is only a small space, and he found it necessary to sit upon timbers which are used for braces for the frame of the cowcatcher. Then he was in a half recumbent position, his hands clutched around the cowcatcher bars while the train was running fast. Being ahead of the drivers and the machinery, he was jolted terrifically by what is technically known as the "fall" of the locomotive. Every little depression in the track permits the dead weight of many tons of iron and steel to fall, with the added speed and momentum of the train, and then in an instant rebound, which is followed by another fall. As the track through Nevada is not level much of the way, Errixson, in his novel eyrie, had the most thorough shaking up of any man who ever stole a ride west of the Rocky Mountains. The air was intensely hot, and the smell of the oil and other odors from the locomotive was stifling. The distance between Winnemucca and Wadsworth is only thirty-six miles, but there are eight stops, and it seemed an age of suffering to Errixson before he reached a place where he could climb down and out of his perch. He climbed under the cowcatcher in the pit of the roundhouse, and got out in Wadsworth. His back was wrenched, his arms seemed ready to fall from their sockets, and his eyes were bloodshot. He staggered from the train undetected, and fell half exhausted in the sage brush, where he slept several hours, awaking with a terrible start from a dream in which he was once more speeding over the alkaline wastes, with the machinery of the locomotive pounding terrifically just back of him.—San Francisco Examiner.

Whittier's Large Fortune.

Whittier left $250,000, though for his earlier poems he received nothing. Lowell, on the other hand, published his first poems at his own expense, and to the end his income from them was small; and it was only in the closing ten or fifteen years of his life that Browning, who had a similar experience with his first volume, received anything from his poems.

MANIA FOR EXCURSIONS.

Some Men Are Ruined by Their Fondness for Jaunting.

"Did you ever hear of a man being ruined by the habit of going on excursions?" asked a sergeant of police yesterday. "It's as bad as the drink habit. It causes just as much trouble, and in these warm months there are just as many people suffering the evil effects of it as there are those who are ruining themselves with whisky. There are lots of people who can't help going on excursions, even though they may have barely money enough to keep soul and body together. Only the other day they had a victim of the habit over in the eighth precinct. He was a man named William Motz, who was arrested for disorderly conduct. His wife claimed he didn't support his family. Motz simply had to go on excursions when the mania came upon him. He couldn't keep away from them. The result was that he spent all his money in this way, and finally brought up in a cell.

"Did you ever notice what a lot of people there are who study the posters advertising cheap excursion rates? A good many of them are in the depths of poverty, and yet they are always going on excursions. That is why some of them are so poor. Why, I knew a family over on the east side who spent just half their income going on trips to the lake resorts. Every Sunday the whole crowd of them would go off to Crystal Beach, or Woodlawn Beach, or Niagara Falls, or some resort, all through the summer. They would leave early in the morning, and would not get back till midnight. Then by Tuesday they'd be off for some other resort. They would go again on Thursday or Friday, and sometimes the old man would go on an excursion every night in the week. He was getting only $70 a month, and I figured up that it cost the family somewhere between $30 and $40 a month for steamboat fares. It was a mystery how they managed to live. The other day his house went on foreclosure sale, and I hear he hasn't been able to pay his grocer for a year, and yet only last Sunday I saw the whole family getting aboard an Elmwood Beach steamer. I'll bet half the people in the poorhouses are victims of the excursion habit.

"I have a family myself," continued the sergeant, after a pause, "but I've shut down on their going on any excursions. If they want to go out of town on a nice little trip once in a while, it's all right, but they can't get on any of these cut-rate affairs. I know if they once got the habit it would take five times the salary I am getting to keep me out of debt."—Buffalo Express.

At President Lincoln's Reception.

The American people treat their public men with cruel kindness in more ways than one, but especially in the matter of handshaking. Mr. Noah Brooks, in his "Washington in Lincoln's Time," gives a striking proof of this in his description of the President's semi-weekly public receptions. A majority of the visitors went in full dress; the ladies in laces, feathers, silks and satins, without bonnets; and the gentlemen in evening dress. But sprinkled through the gaily attired crowds were hundreds of officers and private soldiers, the light blue army coat of the period being a conspicuous feature of the moving panorama.

Here and there a day laborer, looking as if he had just left his work bench, or a hard-working clerk with ink-stained linen, added to the popular character of the assembly.

Usually the President stood in the famous Blue Room, or at the head of the East Room; and those who wished to shake hands made their entrance one by one and were introduced by the functionary detailed for the occasion. So vast were the crowds, and so affectionate their greetings, that Mr. Lincoln's right hand was often so swollen that he would be unable to use it readily for hours afterward; and the white kid glove of his right hand, when the handshaking was over, always looked as if it had been dragged through a dust bin.

Much of the time, I think, the President never heard with his inner ear the names of persons presented to him. His thoughts were far away.

On one occasion, bringing up a friend, I greeted the President as usual, and presented my companion. The President shook hands with me in a perfunctory way, his eyes fixed on space, and I passed on, knowing that he had neither seen me nor heard the name of my friend; but after I had reached a point seven or eight persons beyond, he suddenly seemed to see me, and still continuing the handshaking, he shouted:

"O Brooks! Charley Maltby is in town, and I want you to come and see me to-morrow."

Maltby was an old friend of Mr. Lincoln's, who was then living in California, and about whose petition for a Federal appointment the President wished to talk with me. His sudden outburst, naturally enough, astonished the people who heard it.

Health.

"Why," asked the casual observer, "did you shoot that tenderfoot?"

"Because," replied the chairman of the Civic Federation, always glad to supply reasonable information, "he would otherwise have died of consumption and we are trying to have our town recognized as a health resort, you know."—Detroit Tribune.

Anything for a Change.

"I want a pound of butter," said Mr. Spudds to the grocer.

"Yes, sir; the real or the imitation?"

"Which kind was it you gave me day before yesterday?"

"That was the genuine."

"Then I'll take the imitation this time."—New York World.

An Umbrella Cane.

Cane umbrellas are not a novelty on paper, but as a successful reality they are. A Bavarian named Kroeger has realized man's dream of being provided with a cane and umbrella at the same time. The article is simple enough in its construction. The cane part is of the ordinary size. The metal handle is adjustable and works on a thread. The interior of the cane contains the silk umbrella over a thin but durable frame. To make use of it the handle must be removed, the umbrella pulled out and mounted on the cane, which now serves as an umbrella stick. It is pushed through the bell and screwed fast at the top. The work of just half a minute will accomplish the change.

Is that of dyspepsia. Few remedies do more than palliate this obstinate complaint. Try Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, however, and you will find that it is conquerable, along with its symptoms, heartburn, flatulence, nervousness, and loss of flesh and vigor. Biliousness and constipation frequently accompany it. These, besides malarial, rheumatic and kidney complaints, are also subduable with the Bitters.

Force of Habit.

"When his bicycle collided with the horse he fell off and rolled against the lamp-post, making his nose bleed, blackening his eyes and bruising himself up generally. A crowd gathered about him and some one asked: 'How did this accident happen?' He gathered himself up, wiped the blood from his face, put his hat on and looked around for his machine. 'I haven't had any accident!' he said.

"What made him act that way?"

"They found out afterward that he was the president of a railroad company."

Back Of The Dolar.

We keep hearing that under free coinage, there would be "nothing back of the silver dollar" and it would depreciate. This shows willful ignorance It will have exactly the same backing as now. We have often shown, and not one republican editor or speaker has attempted to disprove it, that the silver dollar under free coinage would have the same backing as now, and no one but a man densely ignorant could believe otherwise. As we have often shown, the silver dollar and the paper dollar are kept at 100 cents, because the government, by law, has to accept them on equal terms with gold. And even if no law put them on this equal footing, yet if it was merely the usage of the government to do this it would keep them up equal to gold. No one of any party favors changing that usage or that law. Then that condition remaining the same, the value of the silver dollar as money will remain as now. Its bullion value would no doubt be higher under free coinage, so that as far as that is concerned we would have a better dollar than now. For if the bullion in a dollar is worth 52 cents now, under the higher price caused by free coinage, it would probably be worth 70 cents or 80 cents. So it is plain that the "dishonest dollar" simply means a better one, if any difference. Again, those who talk about a 50-cent dollar, or dishonest money, are invited to disprove what we have said above.

Railroad Men.

The fact that railroad managers are still trying to influence their men to vote for McKinley keeps coming to light. Within a few days the following circular has been distributed to the employes of the B. & O. at Garrett:

WHY RAILROAD MEN CAN NOT AFFORD TO VOTE FOR FREE SILVER COINAGE

Because the passage of a free silver coinage law would place this country on a silver basis.

This would mean that all values now measured by gold would then be measured by silver.

The result would be a great advance in everything which you have to buy for yourselves and families.

A barrel of flour would cost $9 instead of $4.50. A ton of coal $12 instead of $6. Bacon 20 cents per pound instead of 10 cents; beef and mutton 25 to 30 cents instead of 12½ to 15 cents; coffee 50 cents instead of 25 cents; tea 80 cents instead of 40 cents; a loaf of bread 10 cents instead of 5 cents; and everything which you need would be very much higher.

You would have to earn two dollars, where you now earn one, to be as well off as you now are.

This you know would be impossible. The steam and street railway companies cannot raise their freight and passengers rates, and as they would receive only silver, they could pay you only in the same, and when you went spend your silver dollars you would find they would buy only half as much as they now do.

Not only so, but most railroads have obligated themselves to pay the interest on their bonds in gold and as they would be obliged to pay a heavy premium for gold, they would not able to increase your wages; indeed your wages might not be as high as at present.

No laboring man can afford to receive any but the best dollar for his day's work; and least of all can railroad men afford to work for a dollar which would buy only fifty cents worth of food and clothing.

The whole argument of the free silver men is, that free silver coinage would advance prices. This, of course, means that it would cost you just that much more to live.

Can you afford to pay twice as much for the necessaries of life as you now do? Do you want higher prices? Can you afford to vote for a 50-cent dollar?

Churning Done in One Minute.

I have tried the Lightning Churn, you recently described in your paper, and it is certainly a wonder. I can churn in less than one minute, and the butter is elegant, and you get considerably more butter than when you use a common churn. I took the agency for the churn here and every butter maker that sees it buys one. I have sold three dozen and they give the best of satisfaction. I know I can sell 100 in this township, as they churn so quickly, make so much more butter than common churns and are so cheap. Some one in every township can make two or three hundred dollars selling these churns. By addressing J. F. Casey & Co, St. Louis, you can get circulars and full information so you can make big money right at home. I have made $80 the past two weeks and I have never sold anything in my life before.

Construing above law the court has held (Thomas-McKinney case) that:

"The section of the statute under which this action was instituted defines a number of offenses, namely: (1), For hiring or buying any person, directly or indirectly, to vote any ticket or for any particular candidate; (2), for hiring or buying any person, directly or indirectly, to refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate; (3), for handling any money or other means, knowing the same is to be used to induce, hire or buy any person either to vote or to refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate, and (4), for aiding, abetting, counseling, encouraging or advising either the hiring or buying of a voter either the hiring or buying of a voter ticket or for any candidate. Any person, therefore, who hires or buys, directly or indirectly, a voter to vote for any ticket or for any particular candidate, or who hires or buys such voters to refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate, or who handles any money or other means to be used to induce, hire or buy any voter, either to vote or to refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate, or who aids, abets, counsels, encourages or advises either the hiring or buying of a voter either to vote any particular ticket or for any particular candidate, or to refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate, is liable under the provisions of said act. * * * The plain language of the act conveys to the ordinary mind that the intention of the legislature was to punish the person who hires the voter either to vote or refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate, WHETHER THE VOTER FULFILLS HIS PART OF THE AGREEMENT OR NOT. * * * The offense charged does not consist in inducing the voter by hiring him to vote or to refrain from voting a particular ticket or for or against a particular candidate, but it consists in the giving or agreeing to give to the voter something in consideration that he will or will not vote, and the agreement on the part of the voter to do so."

BRYAN VETERANS

The union generals who are on a political starring expedition over the country, had an embarrassing experience at South Bend. There is a silver club in that city composed of over 200 veteran soldiers. It is called the Two Hundred Veterans' Silver club, and at a previous meeting adopted a greeting to the campaigning generals and appointed a committee, with Chauncy E. Ashcraft, of the old Twenty-sixth Michigan Infantry Volunteers, as chairman, to present the address. Mr. Ashcraft followed his instructions and gave it to Gen. Alger upon the arrival of the generals. The following is

THE ADDRESS.

"To the union generals swinging around the country in the interest of Mark Hanna—Comrades: We are glad to hear that you are on earth today, but very sorry that you are taking the course you are, traveling around the country in gorgeous palace cars fitted up with money earned by the sweat of toiling millions, and calling to arms the old soldiers who followed you from the battle of Bull Run, through Antietam, Gettysburg and Spottsylvania, and through the wilderness under Grant. We respect you because you were then our comrades in arms. We have no objections to your coming into our states as Republicans, as we are well aware that you cannot say one word in favor of the St. Louis, platform, because every farmer, laborer and mechanic in the state of Indiana will at once discover the fallacy of your arguments, and we do offer our solemn protest in the name of the suffering people against you coming here, not as republican speakers, but as Union generals who have set themselves up to dictate to the old soldiers of Indiana how we should vote and to try and fasten upon the people of this country the English standard of finance that has brought distress and ruin upon the common people of every country that has adopted it.

SHAME, SHAME!

We respect all old soldiers, but we think that we have as much patriotism as you have and also think that we are as well posted on financial matters as you are, and know what is good for our own interests, and the interests of the middle classes, such as farmers, laborers and mechanics, as well as you do. We are surprised at your denunciation of the Democratic soldiers as anarchists, etc. While in the army we were called patriots. Shame; shame; generals. We respect Major McKinley as a comrade, but we do not respect Mark Hanna, for you know as well as we that he represents in this campaign every interest that is in direct conflict with the rights of the common people of this nation. You not very long ago were opposed to Cleveland and Carlisle but to-day you indorse the policy of these two men. How inconsistent. We have the patriotism of 1776 in our hearts to-day, and we are fighting on that line, where you should be, if you were doing your duty as American generals, not for an office but for our homes and firesides, and for the future prosperity of our nation. We helped to strike the shackles from the limbs of 4,000,000 of black slaves and we have resolved to prevent your fastening them on several millions of whites. Men of your standing do not know the misery of the people for the want of work and money, to care for their wives and children, and you offer no relief in your platform, only for the shylocks of Wall and Lombard streets.

MAJORITY FOR BRYAN.

Ever since the war the republicans have declared for the double standard, and why the change to-day, gentlemen? Were you deceiving us then or now? Now, gentlemen, please tell your eastern friends that the majority of us will vote for William J. Bryan (one of God's noblemen,) for their own good and the good of their posterity. Trusting that you will see the error of your ways and change your base and fight the battles of the common people, which will be greater honor to you than fighting the sham battles of Wall and Lombard streets, we will then feel proud of you, but not as long as you are dress parading through the country with banners on your cars calling us anarchists, and you patriots.

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa., and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf

INSTRUCTIONS TO VOTERS.

If you want to vote a STRAIGHT DEMOCRATIC TICKET, stamp within the big square containing the ROOSTER at the top of the ticket, and stamp nowhere else.

Remember:

1. You must get your ballots of the polling clerks in the election room.

2. If you want to vote a straight ticket, stamp within the large square at the head of the ticket containing the device of the party for whose candidates you wish to vote. If you do not wish to vote a straight ticket you must not stamp the large square containing the device of your party, but you must stamp the small square to the left of the name of each candidate for whom you desire to vote, on whatever list of candidates it may be. If the large square at the head of the ticket is stamped, and the ballot is stamped at any other place, it is void and cannot be counted, unless there be no candidate for some office in the list printed under such stamped device, in which case he may indicate his choice for such office by stamping the square to the left of the name of any candidate for such office on any other list. The stamp must be placed within or on the square or the ballot is void and cannot be counted.

3. Do not mutilate your ballot, or mark it either by scratching a name off or writing one on, or in any way, except by the stamping on the square or squares, as before mentioned. Otherwise the ballot will not be counted.

4. After stamping your ballots, and before leaving the booth, fold them separately, so that the face of them cannot be seen and so that the initial letters of the names of the polling clerks on the backs thereof can be seen. Then hand your ballots to the inspector, the stamp to the polling clerk, and leave the room.

5. If you are physically unable to stamp your ballots, or can not read English, so inform the polling clerks and tell them how you wish to vote and they will stamp your ballots for you. But the voter and clerks should not permit any other person to hear or see how the ballots are stamped, and it is a penal offense to declare that you can not read English or cannot mark your ballot, if, in fact, you can.

6. If you should accidentally or by mistake deface, mutilate or spoil your ballot, return it to the poll clerks and get a new ballot.

7. You must not accept a ballot from any person outside of the election room. Any ballot outside is fraudulent, and it is a penitentiary offense to have such a ballot in your possession whether you attempt to vote it or not.

8. You must not attempt to hold any conversation in the election room except with members of the election board and the poll clerks.

9. You must not put any mark of any kind on your ballot except with the stamp.

Old Times.

The Huntington Democrat says:

Hon. B. F. Shively related the following in his speech here to very aptly illustrate a point:

It is said that a man with his pants in his boots walked into republican state headquarters the other day and said: Mr. Gowdy, I understand you are keeping a list of all the cranks and all the sound money men. A few years ago I came to town and sold a load of fifty bushels of wheat. I received $64. I paid my taxes, $40; fed my team at the livery stable, got my wife a dress pattern for $10.50 and went home with money in my pocket. To-day I brought in fifty bushels of wheat, for which I received $26. My taxes are still $40. I borrowed $14 from a friend and paid my taxes. I am going home hungry, my team has not been fed and I am taking home no dress pattern for my wife. I want you to put my name down on the list of cranks this year.

MRS. N. C. MILLER.

Of Fort Wayne, Ind., writes on Nov. 29, 1894: "I was afflicted for forty years with heart trouble and suffered untold agony. I had weak, hungry spells, and my heart would palpitate so hard, the pain would be so acute and torturing, that I became so weak and nervous I could not sleep. I was treated by several physicians without relief and gave up ever being well again. About two years ago I commenced using Dr. Miles' Remedies. One bottle of the Heart Cure stopped all heart troubles and the Restorative Nervine did the rest, and now I sleep soundly and attend to my household and social duties without any trouble.

Murderous Assault.

KNOCKED DOWN WITH A CLUB—NO CAUSE KNOWN FOR THE ATTACK

Oct. 13, two men started out from Battle Creek, Mich., to go over the country to get work at husking corn, and the like. They worked along as they could, gradually drifting this way. They had a team and light wagon to bring such things as they needed, and camped out to save expense. Their names are Albert DeyArmond and Delbert Davis. The team belonged to DeyArmond and a large canvas they had with them belonged to Davis. This canvas they arranged at night so that one end would be fixed over a frame they had with them, and serve them for a shelter under which they slept, having each two blankets to make them comfortable. The main part of the canvas they would rig up as a shelter for the team, by fixing a pole under it. Friday evening Oct. 30 they came through Waterloo and on past Swarts' and Bechtel's and as they neared Al. St. Clair's as night was coming on they concluded to stop in the woods there over night. DeyArmond left the tean and Davis and went ahead to St. Clair's and borrowed an ax to cut a pole for the horse tent. He went back to where Davis was waiting and found him sitting there, with a big sort of a club in his hands. He thought nothing of this at the time though since then he recalls to mind that as they went back into the woods together to find a pole, Davis seemed to keep trying it and thumping it against things and onto the ground as if trying its strength. At one point they crossed a wet place and Davis used the stick to steady himself and got some mud on it. As they reached a deep place in the woods suddenly DeyArmond felt a heavy blow on his head. He plunged forward and nearly fell but recovered and turned his head toward Davis, and asked, "Dell what hit me?" Davis struck him again when he called out "What do you want to kill me for? I never harmed you?" By this time Davis was raining blow after blow on DeyArmond's head, and the latter put up his arms to save himself, and the blows fell partly on the arms. DeyArmond had the ax, and drew it to defend himself saying, "I'll cut you down with this ax if you don't stop." He drew the ax and as Davis hesitated to take chances on that, DeyArmond slipped away and escaped. He ran to Al. St. Clair's house, still carrying Al's ax, but Al had started off for Auburn and no one was at home. He then ran on to the next house and found no one there. The next house, is James L. Ferguson's and he and two sons were at home. DeyArmond told his story and his bloody head added to its reality. Ferguson at once started for town to get the sheriff, and the two sons, and DeyArmond went to a neighbor's and finding the man at home got him to go back with them, he taking his revolver. The four men soon met Davis, with the team. He had loaded up everything and was heading this way. He had on DeyArmond's coat and overcoat. The coat he had been wearing that day, but had just put on the overcoat. The men stopped him, and DeyArmond asked what he had got on his overcoat for. Davis said he could have the overcoat if he wanted it, but when accused of assaulting DeyArmond, said he knew nothing of it. Said if he had struck anybody, he had no recollection of it. He threw out of the wagon, his tent, before giving up the team, but the men prevailed on him to put it back in and leave it in safety at some farm house. They finally started on south and after crossing the bridge they soon met the officers from Auburn, Sheriff Stroh, Deputy Small and Marshal John West. They arrested Davis, took him with them and then DeyArmond and the others followed on to town. Davis was lodged in jail, where he will not be tried till next term, which means about holidays. DeyArmond was taken to Dr. Swarts' and had his wounds dressed. There were six or seven cuts on the head and bruises on the arms and he was a bloody spectacle One cut was four inches and another two inches, both going to the skull. The club had cut through the felt hat and a thick head of hair, showing how vicious the blows must have been. There were bad bruises on the arms and hands, but he was feeling well when he left for home this morning. Last evening he went to Dr. Swarts and had the Doctor examine his wounds In an interview with Dr. Swarts this morning he tells us the wounds are healing nicely. Just what Davis made the attack for DeyArmond cannot guess, as the men have been friends for some years. It is possible he wanted to get the team and so intended to kill DeyArmond. The latter went up to the scene of the struggle yesterday, but nothing new was developed. They failed also to find the club that Davis used. He had probably hid it. DeyArmond started home with his team this morning, but will have to come back at the trial.

Lew Wallace.

Saturday's Daily.

The Dispatch came out a day late, this week, but not too late to call the editor of this paper a "liar" six times for telling the truth. It is the truth that hurts. And the truths we publish are backed up by every democrat and every republican who heard Lew Wallace. There is nothing to take back. And a man, who like Lew Wallace, calls his political opponents, anarchists, deserves the flaying we gave him. As the Dispatch denies what we said as to Wallace's failure to re-enforce Grant at Pittsburg landing, we will quote Grant's own words, on the matter. In Grants Personal Memoirs, Vol. I, page 336, in speaking of the battle, and the delay of Wallace at Crump's landing, five miles away, he says:

Up to that time I had felt by no means certain that Crump's landing might not be the point of attack. On reaching the front, however, about eight a. m., I found that the attack on Pittsburg was unmistakable, and that nothing more than a small guard, to protect our transports and stores, was needed at Crump's. Captain Baxter, a quartermaster on my staff, was accordingly directed to go back and order General Wallace to march immediately to Pittsburg by the road nearest the river. Captain Baxter made a memorandum of this order. About one p. m., not hearing from Wallace and being much in need of reinforcements, I sent two more of my staff, Colonel McPherson and Captain Rowley, to bring him up with his division. They reported finding him marching towards Purdy, Bethel, or some point west from the river, and farther from Pittsburg by several miles than when he started. The road from his first position to Pittsburg landing was direct and near the river. Between the two points a bridge had been built across Snake Creek by our troops, at which Wallace's command had assisted expressly to enable the troops at the two places to support each other in case of need. Wallace did not arrive in time to take part in the first day's fight. General Wallace has since claimed that the order delivered to him by Captain Baxter was simply to join the right of the army, and that the road over which he marched would have taken him to the road from Pittsburg to Purdy where it crosses Owl Creek on the right of Sherman; but this is not where I had ordered him nor where I wanted him to go.

I never could see and do not now see why any order was necessary further than to direct him to come to Pittsburg landing, without specifying by what route. His was one of three veteran divisions that had been in battle, and its absence was severely felt.

The Loan Association.

All Auburn people will be pleased to learn that the case about the management of the affairs at Indianapolis is all over and done with. Auditor of state appointed three experts to examine books of the Union National Savings & Loan Association of Indianapolis, and reported to the supreme court that the association was in good condition and had been well managed. Thereupon the plaintiffs who began the suit against the Co. dismissed the case and acknowledged the suit to have no foundation. The case is now out of court and temporary receiver is dismissed. Now that the case is over we trust, people will see how the whole thing was caused by jealousy and spite work. Confidence in the company and its management should now be fully restored.

Bryan's Campaign.'

Chicago Record.

Saturday's Daily.

The remarkable manner in which Candidate William Jennings Bryan keeps up under the duties he has imposed on himself is worthy of note even if the performance be regarded simply as an instance of physical endurance. When it is considered that the ordinary man is more or less fatigued by merely taking a journey of twenty-six hours from Chicago to New York, sitting in a sleeping car all the way and making no exertion, one gets some notion of the physical capacities of Mr. Bryan, who has been riding in all sorts of conveyances since the Chicago convention, snatching sleep where he could and waking up at all sorts of hours to talk to people in all kinds of weather.

He has been ruthlessly pulled out of bed in the chilly dawn after three hours' sleep to make a speech from the car platform and allow hundreds of persons to squeeze his sore and swollen fingers. Day after day he has talked practically all the time that he was not shaking in his seat while bouncing over rough railroads. When his throat became inflamed and sore he has kept on talking till it healed itself. He has been pushed and hauled through friendly mobs until one would think he would have dropped from exhaustion. When he has not been talking or shaking hands he has been scrambling to make the next engagement. He has been the dictator neither of his own hours of sleep nor of his own meal times, and he has eaten what the fates were pleased to grant him.

As a climax to this experience he has jumped into the close of the campaign for a last mad rush through the disputed states, bombarding Chicago with speeches in every part of the city and making a brief foray through Wisconsin, Illinois and Nebraska. Any man of ordinary physique would have given up or moderated the pace long ago. Mr. Bryan seems to thrive on it. If an ill-considered arrangement of the solar system had not limited the day to twenty-four hours, Mr. Bryan would probably double his daily labors and grow fat on them.

Anarchists.

Gen. Harrison it seems, is following in the footsteps of the illustrious Lew Wallace, who several times asserted in Auburn that the followers of Bryan were anarchists. A dispatch from Ligonier to the Cincinnati Enquirer, says:

"In his speech Gen. Harrison appealed to the people not to support a platform that was framed by anarchists and thugs."

DR. G. C. OSGOOD, Lowell, Mass.

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by forcing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."
DR. J. F. KINCHELOE, Conway, Ark.

"Our physicians in the children's department have spoken highly of their experience in their outside practice with Castoria, and although we only have among our medical supplies what is known as regular products, yet we are free to confess that the merits of Castoria has won us to look with favor upon it."

AROUND THE WORLD.

INTELLIGENCE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE.

News from Foreign Shores—Domestic Happenings—Personal Pointers—Labor Notes—Political Occurrences—Fires, Accidents, Crimes, Etc.

Burned to Death.

The home of Albert Robinson, living near Trumbull Station, a few miles from Jackson, Mich., was destroyed by fire and Mrs. Robinson and her 8-year-old daughter were burned to death and Robinson probably fatally burned. Mr. Robinson was trying to build a fire in the kitchen stove and poured kerosene on the fire from a five gallon can. An explosion followed and wrapped in flames. Robinson rushed into the bed-room. His wife wrapped bedding around him to smother the flames and then ran to the kitchen. Robinson, supposing his wife and child had escaped, jumped from a window. The bodies of the mother and child were found in the ruins, both burned to a crisp. Robinson is seriously burned.

Murdered His Wife.

At Norristown, Pa., Chas. O. Kaiser has been placed under arrest charged with the murder of his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Kaiser were supposed to have been waylaid by highwaymen. Mrs. Kaiser was shot dead and Kaiser received a wound in his arm. Suspicion pointed to Kaiser. Detectives searched and found the supposed stolen watches and pocket-books hidden under a stone near where the robbery is supposed to have been committed. A thirty-two caliber revolver with two empty chambers was found about sixty yards away. Kaiser and his wife quarreled only a short time before they took the fatal drive. About two weeks ago Kaiser had his wife's life insured for $3,000.

Jumped the Track.

A fatal accident occurred on the Wyoming Valley Traction lines in which one woman was killed and two women and a boy were seriously injured. A car running from Wilkesbarre, Pa., to Pittston jumped the track about a mile from the former city and fell upon its side, pinioning four of the passengers under the wreck. Julia Walsh, aged 20, of Port Rowkley, had both legs cut off, and died while being removed to the hospital. Maggie Curley of Port Griffith, aged 28, was cut on the head and injured internally. Julia Curley, aged 20, had an arm broken and was cut on the head and body. Dennis Hoban of Midvale, aged 17 years, had a leg broken and sustained internal injuries.

Young Girl Suicides.

Fifteen-year-old Francis Parker, sister of one of the leading physicians of Toledo, Ohio, died the other morning from an overdose of morphine taken with suicidal intent. She had been chided several times for refusing to go to Sunday-school, the teacher of her class being distasteful to her. This is the cause assigned for the rash act. Not long ago her father committed suicide, and her mother is now in the Toledo Insane Asylum.

Two Injured.

At Elgin, Ill., Mrs. Dr. Susan K. Whitford, wife of Prof. H. K. Whitford of Bennett Medical College, Chicago, and her mother, Mrs. E. C. Hall, were terribly hurt by jumping from their carriage when the team ran away. Mrs. Hall is 88 years of age and will probably not recover. The driver stopped the team and if the ladies had not jumped they would have been unharmed.

Again Postponed.

London special: Edward J. Ivory, alias Edward Bell of New York, the alleged Irish-American dynamite conspirator, was once more brought up on remand at Bow Street Police Court, and his examination resumed. At the close of the day's testimony the prisoner's examination was again adjourned for a week.

Startling Confession.

Julius Mannow, who is to hang at Chicago for the murder of Carey B. Birch, in June, 1895, has written a confession in which he exonerates his companion, Joseph Windrath, from participation in the crime. Windrath, however, will not benefit by the confession, as he was hanged last June on Mannow's testimony.

Schooner Lost.

Duluth (Minn.) special: The schooner S. P. Ely is reported to have been driven on the breakwater at Two Harbors in a gale and sunk. Her crew were clinging to the rigging and in imminent danger of being washed off. The northeaster, which raged on Lake Superior the other night was the worst in years.

Fourteen Drowned.

Lisbon special: A severe storm prevails along the coast of Portugal. A fishing boat has been lost near Setubal, eighteen miles southeast of this city. Fourteen fishermen were drowned.

Six Negroes Killed.

Vicksburg (Miss.) special: Tensas parish was frightfully afflicted by a tornado Friday. Six negroes were killed and there was great destruction of buildings on various plantations. The parish was generally visited, and full details are not obtainable.

Pardon Denied.

The President has denied the application for pardon in the case of Luther A. Hall sentenced in Georgia in 1891, to imprisonment for conspiracy to commit murder.

New Senators for Italy.

King Humbert, in honor of the marriage of the crown prince and Princess Helene of Montenegro, has appointed thirty-six new senators, among whom is Prince Emanuel Ruspoli di Poggio Suasa, the syndic of Rome, whose wife was formerly Miss Curtis of Boston.

Train Hit a Carriage.

Dr. W. W. Palmer and Miss Fanny Parker, his grand-daughter, 16 years of age, of Keansburg, N. J., were killed and William Hanran, of Atlantic City, was probably fatally injured by a train of the Central Railroad of New Jersey at Keansburg.

HEAVY DEMAND FOR GOLD.

Subtreasury at San Francisco Has to Call on Chicago for Help.

The subtreasury at San Francisco has just pulled through a rather serious run, which threatened to annihilate its gold reserve and leave it without a dollar with which to redeem the perfect avalanche of greenbacks that poured over the counter. Timely aid came from Chicago and other sources, and when the outpouring of gold finally stopped the $12,000,000 of a few months ago, despite the frequent additions made during that period, was reduced to a bare $4,000,000. For once the subtreasury had on hand more greenbacks than it wanted. In two weeks' time $10,000,000 worth of them were dumped over the counters and the gold they represented withdrawn. There was something like $7,000,000 in gold in the vaults when the run commenced. Chicago was appealed to for aid and sent $4,000,000, and an equally large amount was secured from the mint, while the $1,500,000 in British sovereigns recently received from Australia were coined into double eagles at the mint and carted to the subtreasury. Only $4,000,000 of the entire amount was left after the flurry was over. That has since been increased by the deposit of over $1,000,000 upon which greenbacks have been withdrawn, and there is every indication that the flurry is over. Much of the gold withdrawn went beyond the mountains. The subtreasuries in San Francisco and at New York are the only ones authorized to redeem greenbacks. Usually the demand for greenbacks is steady at the subtreasury there, as exchange is almost invariably in favor of New York, and it costs less to ship greenbacks than gold.

TO PROTECT THE FUR SEALS.

Japan and Russia Will Co-Operate with the United States.

It is stated by officials that the United States will have the support of both Russia and Japan in the approaching issue over establishing adequate protection for the fur seals of the North Pacific Ocean. The Japanese Government stands ready to join the United States in any plan of seal protection, and is desirous also of including sea otters, which are being exterminated from the Japanese Islands. The co-operation of Japan is said to be of much importance to the United States, as the seal poachers and pirates have fitted out mainly at Japanese ports. A large trade with them has been built up at Yokohama and Nagasaki. Notwithstanding this, Japan feels it to her interest to suppress the pirating. Many of the Canadian poachers go to Japanese ports and either ship under the Japanese flag or take out sealing permits from the British consuls there. The Japanese Government wants the prohibitions made far-reaching, so that no doubt will exist as to the permanent preservation of the seal and otters. The Russian Government also, it can be said authoritatively, will welcome an extension of the protection to the seals.

TWO ELEVATORS BURN.

Great Conflagration Raged in Chicago Monday.

A fire that destroyed property amounting to over half a million dollars started in Chicago Monday morning in elevator A of the Chicago & Pacific Elevator Company and practically consumed the two immense structures filled with wheat, which are situated on the north branch of the Chicago river, near Bliss street. Elevator A, where the fire started, is situated on the bank of the river, while elevator B is farther back. The capacity of the two buildings is 1,500,000 bushels. There was stored in them at the time the fire broke out something like 1,250,000 bushels of grain, most of this being wheat. The fire, it is thought, originated in the engine-room and spread so rapidly that the firemen were unable to get the flames under control. Before the structure had burned to the ground the flames threatened the large malting house of Hales & Curtis, adjoining, and a special call was sent for ten extra engines in order to make an effort to keep the flames from spreading. Firemen had a narrow escape. They were working close to the building when a section of wall fell, almost burying them.

Sultan's Shrewd Game.

The report that trouble of a serious nature is brewing in Turkey has so often been sent out that any fresh announcement to that effect is looked upon as having little or no foundation in fact. But in spite of this, it is only right to state once more that everything points to further and very serious trouble preparing on all sides throughout the Turkish Empire. The ball was set rolling Wednesday, when the Sultan signed two irades, which were issued the next day, levying a poll tax of 5 piastres per head on all Mussulmans and increasing the taxes on sheep, public works and education by 1 to 1½ per cent., the funds so raised to be devoted to military purposes. This caused the representatives of the powers to send a collective note to the Porte, couched in the strongest language, calling attention to the danger that the arming of the Mussulmans was certain to create and pointing out generally the critical situation of affairs in the Turkish Empire. But large purchases of arms have already been made and the danger increases hourly. The action of the Turkish government in completing the armament of the Mustanfuz indicates that the empire is facing a situation which may necessitate calling forth all the military forces at its disposal and it also indicates that the situation is the gravest since the Russo-Turkish war. Under these circumstances, it is but natural that considerable uneasiness prevails.

Farmers to Meet.

The sixteenth annual session of the Farmers' National Congress will shortly assemble in Indianapolis to continue for several days, and according to present indications it will be largely attended. The sharp advance in the price of cereals has furnished to many agriculturists who take an interest in the congress the wherewithal to make the trip from their homes for the purpose of listening to the papers and taking part in the discussions. The present officers of the association are: President, B. F. Clayton, of Indianola, Iowa; Vice Presidents, Maj. G. M. Ryals, of Savannah, Ga.; Col. J. C. Cunningham, of Cunningham, N. C.; Secretary, John M. Stahl, of Chicago. The national congress is entirely nonpartisan, and is in the nature of a conference of farmers for discussion on matters relating exclusively to farmers, and for the recommendation to legislative bodies of such legislation as is beneficial to agricultural interests. At the coming convention the questions of overproduction, the advantages of large and of small farms, the relations of millers to farmers, the duty of the National Government toward sheep husbandry and kindred subjects will be discussed by leading farmers of the country.

Chicago Girl Wins Suit.

A jury in the New York Supreme Court returned a verdict awarding Bertha Robinson, of Chicago, $4,500 damages from David Wiesenberger, of New York City, for breach of promise of marriage.

Tornado Does Damage in Texas.

Wednesday afternoon there was a well-defined tornado formed in Squirrel Creek bottom, four miles west of the village of Farmington, Texas, and about ten miles west of Sherman. Parties who saw it at its inception say that out of a seething, tumbling mass of inky clouds a funnel-shaped column descended until it touched the earth, and then it began to move northeastward, and accompanied by the usual terrific crash and roar as it tore through the bottoms, uprooting large trees and demolishing everything in its path, which for the first mile or two was thirty or forty yards in width. A number of people are reported to have been more or less seriously injured. A severe rain, wind and thunder storm which passed over New Orleans caused one death and did other damage. The lightning, which was heavy, struck five houses. Albert Trahina, an occupant of one of them, was struck and instantly killed. Many trees were blown down and houses unroofed. Most of the fruit sheds of the Queen and Crescent road were destroyed, as well as several electric lights, and nearly all the wires were tangled so as to interrupt the fire alarm telegraph and stop most of the electric cars.

MOST GIGANTIC BLAST.

Long Cove Quarries in Maine the Scene of the Undertaking.

Booth Bros., of New London, Conn., operators of the Long Cove quarries in Maine, have received the details concerning a gigantic blast set off on a hill over the bed of a quarry there to loosen an underground ledge of granite so that it could be quarried. The blast was a success, about 500,000 tons of stone having been moved in a mass. Work on the undertaking had been going on for nearly a year. On Jan. 27 a shaft four feet wide was begun on top of the hill and was extended down 64 feet. From this point, east and west, were run two shafts, and from the ends of these arms cross tunnels, forming on each end the letter T. The blast was fired by electricity and was witnessed by several thousand persons. As the mine was sprung the ground was felt to tremble and shake, and the whole hill, beneath which the explosive was doing its work, rose bodily into the air. Large trees were carried up with it, as were great bowlders, which were tossed about like so many pebbles. Jets of flame and smoke darted from the mass, which rose 75 feet, and, poising for an instant, returned heavily to the earth with the crashing, grinding roar of an avalanche. Over the spot a cloud of dust and smoke hung for half an hour. As it lifted it was seen that grass, shrubbery, and trees were gone. Nine tons of powder were used in the blast.

TO MAKE A LONG CRUISE.

Flagship Philadelphia Ordered to Prepare for a Pacific Trip.

The flagship Philadelphia has been ordered to prepare for a cruise along the South American coast. She will leave San Francisco in about three weeks and it is thought she will spend the most of her time during the coming winter in ports along the Peruvian coast. Admiral Beardslee will make the cruise in the Philadelphia and not transfer his flag to the Oregon as was expected when the battleship went into commission. The Philadelphia is not expected to return to San Francisco before April, and it is said that Admiral Beardslee may be relieved from duty when his vessel again reaches the navy yard.

Two Kentucky Mormons Killed.

Mormon elders have been holding meetings in Elliott County, Ky., and Elit Isom and his whole family joined the church. On Friday night three young men named Sparks declared that they would break up the Mormon business and started for the meeting. They stopped at the home of Isom and demanded admittance. They were admitted, but when Isom learned their mission he put them out and shut the door. The young men fired through the doors and windows. Elit Isom was shot twice in the breast, and Mrs. Isom was shot in the abdomen. Both wounds were mortal. The Sparkses then fled.

Nitroglycerin Breaks Loose.

Two men were killed and five persons injured—three seriously—by an explosion of 1,800 pounds of nitroglycerin at the Acme Dynamite Company's works, near Hulton, Pa. The injured were all employes engaged at work in another department 300 feet away from the scene of the explosion, which was in the mixing department. The building was completely demolished and the bodies of the two men mangled beyond recognition. The loss was about $5,000. Windows were shattered and houses shaken for a distance of more than a mile.

One Hundred Rebels Killed.

A telegram received at London from St. Paul de Londa, Portuguese west Africa, says the Portuguese expedition has just punished the rebellious Bendo natives, burning twenty-four of their villages and killing 100 of the rebels.

French Are Suspicious.

The French Government are preparing to strengthen their garrisons near the Belgian frontier. The establishment of a German camp at Elsenborn, close to the Belgian border, is the cause for their action.

Father Kills Lover.

At Richmond, Ky., Charles James fatally shot Jacob Garrison. The trouble was due to James' objecting to Garrison's attention to the former's daughter.

DEATH IN ITS WAKE.

SEVERAL PERSONS ARE KILLED BY A CYCLONE.

New Orleans Suffers Damages to the Extent of $100,000—And at Many Points in Mississippi, Oklahoma and Indian Territory Lives Are Lost.

Disaster in the Southwest.

About 4:30 o'clock Thursday afternoon a cyclone struck New Orleans on the river front, just above Peniston street, and swept over a distance of about a mile and a half, or thirty blocks from Peniston street to Robin street, the track of the storm being about 1,500 feet wide from the river to Annunciation street. The first building damaged was the Independence oil mill, situated at the head of Peniston street. It was unroofed and building and contents damaged to the amount of $6,000. The conveyers of the new elevator of the Illinois Central Railroad were slightly damaged and John White Meyer and John J. Buck, employed at the elevator, were severely injured. Hundreds of buildings in the track of the storm were damaged, many being partly unroofed and chimneys prostrated, trees uprooted and fences blown down. The storm-swept section of the city is in darkness, owing to the prostration of electric light wires, and details of the damage are difficult to obtain. Some lives were reported lost at first, but these reports have not been verified. The property loss is estimated at $100,000.

Tensas Parish, La., was visited by a destructive cyclone at 12 o'clock. At Lake St. Joseph the large brick gin on the Mound plantation belonging to Joseph Curryn was practically destroyed. Twelve cabins on Locust Island were completely demolished, and one colored woman was instantly killed and several were blown into the lake. At Johnson's Bend, on Lake St. Joseph, leased by A. Bland, the gin house containing a quantity of hay, was totally wrecked. Three barns containing corn were also destroyed and a great deal of the corn was blown away. Six cabins were in its path and all were blown to pieces. Telegraph and telephone wires are down and the public road on Lake St. Joseph front is covered with fragments of houses, furniture, clothing, cotton, corn and household effects. Two colored men and two colored women and a baby were drowned in Lake Bruen, where they were carried by the wind.

The storm passed through the outskirts of the town of Delay, Miss., and demolished several houses. The house of Milton Eskridge was blown away, but his wife and seven children who were in the house miraculously escaped with slight bruises. The extent of the damage cannot be given. Not a tree was left standing in the cyclone's path.

A cyclone swept over a stretch of country about twenty miles east of Guthrie, O. T., at 7:30 o'clock Wednesday night, devastating a district several miles long and probably a hundred yards wide. The farmhouse of William Toby was first in the path of the storm. The building was destroyed and Toby was probably fatally injured. The other members of his family escaped. Half a mile further north the Mitchell postoffice and store was lifted bodily into the air, carried a hundred yards and dashed to the earth. The building was smashed into splinters, and Postmaster M. L. Mullin and his wife, who lived in the building, were killed. They died clasped in each other's arms. Two sticks were driven through Mr. Mullin's skull, but there was not a scratch on the body of his wife. The Mullins came from Rock Island, Ill. The farmhouse of Abner Jones was also wrecked and many smaller buildings were destroyed, trees uprooted and crops ruined.

Rumors are current that the same storm did frightful damage further northeast, in Payne County, and that several persons were killed. There was a tremendous fall of rain, and considerable damage was done by washouts and the carrying off of crops.

At Wewoka, I. T., the cyclone destroyed Gov. Brown's store, a new church and four other buildings. Several persons were hurt, but none seriously. At mine No. 12, near Krebs, it is reported five people were killed. In Lincoln County Mr. and Mrs. John McLaughlin have been found dead in the ruins of their home, and Harrison Jones will die of his injuries.

MET A TRAGIC END.

Sultan's Councilor of State Assassinated by Armenians.

Nouri Effendi, who has been assassinated by Armenians in Constantinople, was a bitter enemy of the persecuted race of Christians. The Sultan is deeply grieved at his death. That Nouri would meet a tragic end had been feared and predicted. No man in the Sultan's cabinet was more outspoken in his enmity to the Armenians, and no one did more to render their condition unbearable. As Councilor of State he possessed great power, which he used to further the ends of his imperial and cruel master. It was he who successfully plotted the overthrow of the Armenian patriarch, Izmirlian. The successor of this patriarch as the head of the Armenian church is Mgr. Bartolomeos, the Gregorian bishop of Brusa. He was the locum tenens of that high office pending the election of a permanent patriarch, and is highly esteemed by the Turks, for whom he has shown great friendship. Bartolomeos is detested and distrusted by the Armenians, who have felt all the more keenly their accursed condition when their religious head is an open enemy of theirs and an avowed friend to the Sultan and his Mohammedan following. Nouri Effendi was known among the Armenians as the prime mover in the plot that removed the old patriarch, and his death is regarded as a warning to the Sultan to be prepared for the end that has come to many predecessors.

News of Minor Note.

Miss Maude Hatfield, 15 years old, was accidentally shot in the arm by Frank Lewis at Kingsley, Mich. The limb was amputated.

The Washington mills, which form one of the largest cotton dress goods manufacturing firms in Lawrence, Mass., were badly damaged by fire.

Emma Field, victim of Robella Starks, who shot her because she refused to accompany him home from a political meeting, died at her home at Jeffersonville Ind.

Some time ago the Navy and War Departments decided to train carrier pigeons for use in case of war. The stations at Newport, R. I., and Portsmouth navy yard were selected for this purpose. A large dove cote is being erected and a large coop of the finest birds of the carrier breed will be kept there.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion rendered by Justice Biddick at Little Rock, Ark., held that the Governor has the right to appoint members of the Legislature where vacancies have been caused by death, resignation or other causes. This is said to be the first case of this character decided in any State in the country.

"FIGHTING JOE" BLACKBURN.

The Kentucky Senator Has a Record in Fistic Encounters.

The recent controversy between Senators Blackburn, of Kentucky, dubbed "Fighting Joe," and Logan Carlisle, son of the Senator's hated rival, Secretary Carlisle, led to rumors of a duel. Blackburn has long professed the duello, but has never gone much further than a challenge toward the field of honor. His "fistic" record, however, is a bad one.

Blackburn is nearly three score years of age, six feet tall, straight as a poplar, and broad-shouldered. He goes about on his feet as light as a dancing master, and gives one an impression of physical alertness, of supple joint and ample thew. From his collar button down he will overmatch any other Senator save, perhaps, Allen, of Nebraska. Blackburn, when a little younger, was considered a fine type of physical manhood—light-haired, red-mustached, blue-eyed, of sanguine temperament, popular with the masses, a splendid stumper, with a rich vein of humor and great powers of invective. His gallantry as an officer in the Confederate army won for him the sobriquet of "Fighting Joe." After the war he went to Congress, and one afternoon indulged in a debate with another Representative. A personal insult led to a challenge from Blackburn, which was readily accepted. Blackburn's second was a noted duellist, whom we will call Tom. All arrangements were made, and in the early morning Blackburn went quietly out to find his second and repair to the field of honor. But the duel did not come off. The second, as was his privilege, substituted himself for his principal, and thus explained the matter:

"Joe, I'm not much good to anyone, and you are valuable to your country. Your country can't afford to lose you, and I don't mean it shall. What I've done is for the best."

In vain Blackburn protested. But the matter was in the hands of his second, and he couldn't alter it. When the enemy learned that "Tom, the dead shot," was to take Blackburn's place on the field, there was a hasty conclusion that the affair, after all, was not too serious to be patched up by peacemakers.

That is the nearest he ever came to a duel, though he and Gen. Burnside came close to it in 1882. He had an imbroglio with Judge Rucker, of Denver, in 1888, which threatened serious results, but nothing came of it.

In February, 1889, at a Senatorial committee meeting, Senator Chandler, of New Hampshire, called the Kentuckian a "slave driver." Trembling with anger, Blackburn arose and walked straight to where Chandler sat. Doubling his big fist and shaking it in the New Hampshire Senator's face, he cried: "I never owned a slave, but you —— little scoundrel, if you were not such an insignificant little coward I would thrash you of this very spot! I have a mind to pull you from your chair and whip you as I would a dog."

"FIGHTING JOE" BLACKBURN.

"You dare not hit me!" Senator Chandler exclaimed, with a tremor in his voice. "Don't put a hand on me." Before any of the Senators could interfere Blackburn reached out and took Chandler by the ear, jerking him from the chair as easily as though he had been a 10-year-old boy. Using Chandler's ear as a sort of handle, he yanked the little New Englander about the room in the roughest manner.

"You dirty coward!" exclaimed the Kentuckian, as he finally released his grip on Chandler's ear, "if I had pulled my daughter's ear in that way I would expect her to resent it. I expected you to fight, but you are a cowardly dog."

Senator Faulkner acted as peacemaker, and the combatants were kept from further violence.

A Crooked River.

A well-known traveling man was gracefully poised against a New York hotel register.

"You may not believe me," he said, "but when I was down in Kentucky, in October, I stood on a bit of high ground in Breathitt County and threw a stone into the Kentucky river, then without moving my feet, though I turned, my body slightly, I threw another stone seven miles down the river."

"Rats!" interpolated a party who had heard commercial traveler stories before.

"It's a true bill," insisted the narrator. "It was just seven miles from where the first stone struck the water to where the second one hit, and I'm not a baseball player, either."

After some discussion the commercial traveler held up his hand and swore to his story, and then explained that at Jackson, in Breathitt County, the Kentucky river swings around a bend for seven miles and comes back to within sixty-eight feet of itself, and a man, standing on the narrow ridge separating the waters, can easily toss a stone into the river to the right or left, thus making a throw of seven miles up or down the river, as the case may be.

This is the true state of the case.

Silver and Gold Coins.

Herodotus tells us that silver was first coined as money in Argos about 800 B. C. The same historian tells us that King Croesus of Lydia was the first to coin gold and that 560 B. C. he had gold coins issued with his image and superscription.

CHAPTER II.—(Continued.)

Edith Grace heard the sound of Mrs. Leigh's invalid chair moving towards the dining room door, the door open and the chair pass down the hall and into Mrs. Leigh's bedroom; and then the dragging, lame footsteps of the hunchback on the tiles of the back hall.

Suddenly she heard a sound that made her heart stand still, her breath cease to come. She grew rigid with terror. She heard a something soft sliding over the outside of her door. A hand! It touched and rattled the handle. The handle turned, and with a low, dull sound the door opened!

Leigh entered the room with slow, deliberate, limping steps. She could hear the footfall of his left foot and the slight, brushing touch of his right foot as he drew it after the left.

"Hah!" he muttered, "how cool and refreshing the rain is. What is it I came into this room for? Stay. Let me think. Oh, yes! my mother asked me to put the window down before I went upstairs. I will. There!"

He let the window down without any regard to the noise. It smote harshly upon the sill. Edith did not move, did not make a sound. Leigh turned away from the window, and began slowly retracing his steps to the door, muttering:

"Yes, she has run away; run away from this house a few hours after entering it. Run away, frightened, terrified by my ugliness. We shall see, Edith Grace. We shall see. I did not tell my mother the name of the girl I mean to marry. She shall know it soon enough, and not all the wiles or force of man shall keep me from my purpose, keep Edith Grace from me!"

Oscar Leigh turned, fumbled for the door handle, and, having found it, went out of the room, closing and latching the door quietly after him. Then she heard him toilfully, ponderously, going upstairs. Presently a door above was closed, and complete silence fell upon the house. The spell lifted from the girl, and she sank back in the chair with a tremulous, heavy sigh of relief.

CHAPTER III.

Edith did not know how long she sat with her face covered with her hands. When she took them from before her face and looked at the window it was light. Oscar Leigh had lowered the window. She caught the sash and raised it very gently. In a minute she was outside the gate on the open road. She closed the gate noiselessly behind her, and hastened away.

In five minutes she located the village, and in an hour she was at the railroad depot. The city-bound train was waiting. She bought a ticket and went into the rear coach. No one else was yet aboard, and entering the last seat, she sat far back in its dim corner. Now the full effect of her long walk, the reaction from the excitement of the night and want of sleep fell upon her with leaden weight of drowsiness. Other passengers began to arrive, but she did not even open her eyes to observe them. One of the newcomers paused as he saw her, stared vaguely, and quietly sat down in the seat opposite across the aisle. In less than a minute the train steamed out of the station. The girl slept on with a smile of relief and deliverance around her fresh young mouth.

The traveler was a short, deformed man, and carried a heavy, crooked walking stick. For a few minutes after the train began to move he remained without moving. The girl slept heavily, swaying slightly from side to side with the motion of the train; her two gloved hands lay placidly on her lap. Between the thumb and forefinger of her right hand was the ticket she had bought, representing all the money she had had.

When the train had been five minutes on its way and had gained its full speed the man leaned toward the sleeping girl, and, with infinite gentleness and care, drew the ticket out of her hand, keeping his eyes on her eyelids the whole time. Without taking his eyes off her face he raised his right hand, thrust it, holding the ticket between his thumb and finger, out of the carriage window, and dropped the ticket into the rushing air. Then he sat back in his corner opposite Edith, and sighed and smiled.

CHAPTER IV.

It was early in the afternoon the same day. The rain of the night before had been general. It had fallen heavily in the city and washed and freshened the dusty, parched streets. Even Chetwynd street, a third-rate thoroughfare, looked gay in comparison with its usual squalor, for it had been scoured clean and sweetened by the waters of heaven.

The two most prosperous shopkeepers in the place were Mr. Williams, landlord of the public house, and Mr. Forbes, baker, at the opposite corner. Mr. Williams' house was all glitter and brightness on the ground floor. It had two large plate glass windows, divided only by a green and gilt iron pillar. Mr. Forbes was not so lavish of glass or gaslight as his neighbor. His only window on the shop floor was composed of panes of moderate size. Beyond the shop door, was another door belonging to him; the door to the staircase and dwelling part of the house above the shop.

For the second floor he had a most respectable tenant, who paid his rent with punctuality, and gave no trouble at all. There were three rooms on the second or top floor. A sitting room, a bed room and a work shop.

The tenant of the top floor of the bakery was Mr. Oscar Leigh. The room over the hall was his bedroom; the room over the store was his sitting room; the room looking into the street was his work shop.

That Thursday afternoon he walked slowly along Chetwynd street, nodding pleasantly to those he knew slightly, and exchanging cheerful greetings with those he knew better. When he came to the public house he entered.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Williams," said the newcomer, wriggling up on a high, cane-seated stool.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Leigh," said the landlord in a gracious and pleasant voice. "Very hot walking out of doors."

"Very. Will you have a brandy?"

"It's almost too hot. But I will, as you are kind enough to ask me."

The landlord busied himself getting the drinks, and then set them on the counter. The hunchback drained his glass at one draught, the landlord sipped his.

"I wanted that badly," said Leigh.

"What's the matter, Mr. Leigh? Anything wrong down in the country?"

"No, no. I feel better already. Give me another. I'm tired. I've had such a morning.

Up to this point of the conversation it had been obvious the two men were not speaking freely. Now suddenly, Leigh leaned over the counter and spoke in a whisper:

"Did you watch?" he asked, keenly and anxiously.

"I did."

"At between twelve and one?"

"Yes."

"And did you see anything?" tremulously.

"I did," stolidly.

"What?"

"You told me a man was to come and wind up your clock, as near to twelve as could be, and you asked me to watch him and see that he was sharp to his hour and that he wound up the machinery by the left-hand lever close to the window."

"Quite right. I wanted to find out if the fellow would be punctual and do my work for me while I was away in the country."

"I saw a man sitting in your place, and in a few seconds he began to wind up the machinery."

"I am most desirous to know all facts, all you saw. You know how well I have guarded the secrets of my great clock. I am most anxious that no one but this man who wound the clock for me last night should learn anything about it."

"And can't he tell everybody if he cares to betray you?"

"Not very well. He cannot. He is deaf and dumb, and can't write," with a triumphant smile.

"We were shut a minute before half-past twelve by my own watch. I kept my eyes on him until half-past twelve. He must have turned out the light before he got up, for the gas went out at half-past twelve, just as he stopped working the lever."

"Well, you have done me a good turn in keeping your eye on that fellow for me, and you're going to do me another good turn by saying nothing about it. Have you ever heard anything of Albertus Magnus?"

"No."

"Albertus Magnus was a man who studied magic, one of the greatest of the magicians of old. He attributed wonderful powers to the powdered asphaltum of mummies, the old pitch which the ancient Egyptians poured hot over the dead. It was used by the Egyptians to prevent the ravages of time upon the faces of the dead. Now, I am going to paint the dials of my clock with mummy pitch to prevent time ravaging the faces of my clock."

"I always said, Mr. Leigh, that you were a wonderful, a most wonderful man."

"And to-day I bought a mummy, the mummy of a great Egyptian prince, for I must have good mummy asphaltum to preserve the faces of my clock from the influence of time."

CHAPTER V.

When Oscar Leigh emerged from the door of the public house he moved rapidly along the front of Forbes' bakery until he reached the private entrance to that house. Then he opened the door with a latch key and entered. He ascended the stairs, found himself opposite the door of his flat, opened that door with another latch key, and went in.

The little man slammed the door behind him, came to the sitting room, passed through it, then through the sleeping chamber beyond and thence into the workshop or clock room. The latter door he unlocked with a small patent key. He pushed the door open very cautiously. Some small object placed on the inside against the door, fell with a slight noise. It was caused by the overturning of a small metal egg-cup on the floor. It had been so placed that the door could not be pushed open from the passage without upsetting it.

"Here is conclusive proof that my sanctuary has been inviolate while I have been from home," he muttered. "Poor Williams! A useful man in his way; very. A worthy soul. I have succeeded in my first great experiment. I wonder how it goes with my dumb deputy of last night? Ha-ha-ha!"

He turned away from the door and confronted a thicket of shafts and rods and struts and girders and pipes and pulleys and wheels and drums and chains and levers and cranks and weights and springs and cones and cubes and hammers and cords and bands and bells and bellows and gongs and reeds, through all of which moved a strange weird tremulousness and plaintive perpetual low sounds, and little whispers of air and motion, as though some being, hitherto uncreated, were about to take visible life out of inertia, and move in the form of a vast harmonious entity in which all this distracting detail of movement would emerge into homogeneous life.

The framework of the clock consisted of four upright polished steel pillars, which touched the ceiling of the room about nine feet from the floor. One side of the parallelogram measured twelve feet, the other ten. The sole window in the room was in the middle of one of the larger sides of the parallelogram, and could be approached only through the body of the clock itself. The body of the clock close by the window was not fully filled up with mechanism, and this free space, combined with the embrasure of the window, made a small interior chamber, in which were a stout high-backed easy chair, and an oak watchmaker's bench. The framework of the clock was secured to the floor by screws.

After a long and searching look through the metallic network of the machine, Oscar Leigh sat down on the chair, and gave himself up to thought.

"Ay," he said, crossing one of his short legs over the other. "I have succeeded so far in my labors here. I began my clock as an excuse, as a cloak to cover any other matter that might come my way. It has grown on me from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, from year to year, until it has swelled in size and efficacy altogether beyond my original designs or desires. I wished to have a slave that might be used as an excuse for solitariness and eccentricity in dealing quietly in precious metals and precious stones, and now I find myself face to face with a master. Whither will this master lead me? I do not know. I do not care. I first intended this room as a chamber of mystery; it has become a cave of magic. My heart ought to be drunk with joy. My heart would be drunk with joy only for——" He paused and waved his hand before his eyes as if to clear the air before him. "Only for that girl. This mere girl, this mere Edith Grace, this mere Edith Grace whom I have seen. What noise is that in the street? Something out of the common."

He caught hold of one of the polished steel pillars that formed the framework of the breathing machine and dropped his chin on his misshapen chest. "With care I could now become rich—no matter how. A fortnight ago I brought all my arrangements to perfection. I have hit upon a plan for transcending the wonders of mystery gold with its tin and platinum and copper imposture. I have hit upon a plan of making miracle gold! A fortnight ago I had made up my mind to go on with its manufacture. I am but a weak, fickle creature, I who had been so firm and strong, and whole hearted! I advertise for a companion for my poor old mother and I see this girl, this Edith Grace, with her airs and graces and high notions. And now she will not have me, she will not rest under the roof to which I am free, she flies from me as from vile contagion, and I am driven back upon this miracle gold. Timmons will be here with some of it to-night. That is the first step on the way down. Ah, there's that noise again below. Let me see what it is."

BETRAYED HIMSELF.

The Merchant's Bluff Indicated His True Standing to His Creditors.

"'Tis true as the book," says a Maine lawyer, "that more crimes are discovered through the efforts made to prevent discovery than in any other way. The mind of the wrongdoer is not satisfied with simply keeping still. It is uneasy and overcautious, and leads its owner pretty surely to do some act he would not have done if innocent. In just the same way shrewd business men read the minds of their debtors. Let an apparently prosperous man become seriously involved, and very often he will try to screen his real situation by doing things that imply a solvent condition, all for the purpose of deceiving his creditors.

"A quarter of a century ago I was practicing in a western Maine village, and among my intimate friends was a young merchant who had apparently been doing a very successful business for several years. His credit was as good as almost anybody's in the town. To my great surprise one evening there came to me the principals of two large Portland firms, to whom my friend was indebted, and they requested an immediate attachment of his stock of goods. I protested that such a course was unjust and unnecessary. Then one of the merchants explained that a day or two previous he had received a letter from their debtor in which he casually mentioned some proposed action of his which would involve a considerable outlay of money. He didn't believe the man really intended any such outlay, and he asked himself, 'Why has he mentioned this?' Conferring with his neighbor, he found the young man had at the same time written him an exactly similar letter. That was enough, and they decided to sue. Feeling almost sure they were wrong, I had the attachment made so secretly that none knew of it except those immediately concerned. The young merchant was immensely surprised, and at once got friends to become his security on the Portland debts. But the developments of the next few months showed conclusively that the merchants had rightly read the meaning of the unusual letter and that their debtor's affairs were at that time rotten to the core. Only their prompt action saved their claims which together amounted to something more than a thousand dollars."—Lewiston Journal.

The pastor of a New England church announced that the regular weekly prayer meeting would be devoted to discussion of a certain question of general interest to the congregation. Many members of the church wished to take part in the discussion; it was therefore decided to limit each member's remarks to five minutes. The Presbyterian Messenger tells how one person managed to extend his time.

When the speaker's time had expired, the clergyman was to notify him by rapping with a pencil on a desk. Deacon A., a notoriously long-winded speaker and exhorter, was one of the members at whom the restriction was especially directed. As everybody anticipated, the deacon was one of the first to address the meeting, and he had not fairly started on his remarks when the rap of a pencil was heard.

"Am I to understand," asked the deacon, turning to Doctor X., "that my five minutes have expired?"

"Yes, deacon; I am sorry, but your time is up."

"And all general remarks are limited to five minutes?"

"Yes, that was the understanding."

The deacon turned very deliberately to his fellow-members. "Then, brethren," he proceeded, "I shall throw the remainder of my remarks into the form of a prayer." The deacon kept the floor.

The formation of good habits early in life becomes the imperative duty of every person. The business man realizes its priceless value in business habits; the educationalist recognizes its essentials to good scholarship. Our proper life depends more upon common sense habits than anything else. In all departments of life and activity man is a creature of habit. The universe is timed to good habits. The law of habit makes all things easy. Habit makes good deeds easy, and bad ones difficult.—Rev. Reuen Thomas.

There are some spirits which must go through a discipline analogous to that sustained by Elijah. The storm struggle must precede the still small voice. There are hearts which must be broken with disappointment before they can rise into hope. Blessed is the man who recognizes his Father's voice in the undertone of the tempest, and bares his head and bows his knee as Elijah did.—Robertson.

In 1886 there were sixty-eight cycle factories in England. Now there are nearly 700.

THE HUSKING BEE.

The husking of the corn, you know,
Is something now in line;
October's mellow hazes glow
With colors superfine.
It's kissing in the corner,
And hugging in the dark;
The lovers of the rural parts
Are ready for the lark.

There's rosy Kate, without a fear,
Her teeth are pearly white;
There's lusty Will, who's found an ear
That's red—and his delight.
It's kissing in the corner,
And hugging in the dark;
The lovers of the rural parts
Are ready for the lark.

It's up and down the middle;
"Cross over to the right;"
The banjo and the fiddle;
Round the husking bee's delight.
It's kissing in the corner,
And hugging in the dark;
The lovers of the rural parts
Are ready for the lark.

TRAINING FIRE HORSES.

They Are Instructed to Jump When the Gong Is Sounded.

The training of fire horses is indeed interesting and exciting. In some of the larger cities training stables for new horses are established. In these stables the newly acquired animals are put through their paces in much the same fashion as an "awkward squad" in a military organization. A well-known authority on fire horses says: "It is better to put a new fire horse into the stall which he is permanently to occupy at the outset. It is as necessary for a raw horse to accustom himself to new surroundings as it is for a human being to adapt himself to new conditions. Under the training stable system which obtains in some cities a new horse is sometimes drilled for as much as a month before he is assigned to an engine house. It very often happens that when such a training stable graduate is finally put on engine house duty, he is so bewildered by the strangeness and unfamiliarity of his new berth that he forgets all that has been taught him in the training stable, and must be instructed all over again."

LIMBERING UP.

The drilling of the new horses is very interesting and entertaining. The engine house gong is sounded. The man standing at the horse's head pulls down the string bolt and releases the tie-strap. Standing at the rear of the stall is a fireman who slaps the horse on the haunch, upon which the man at the horse's head promptly leads him out to the pole, where he is hooked up. On the third and fourth repetition of the lesson, most horses learn what this means. The brighter animals will often get out of their own accord on the signal within twenty-four hours after their first lesson. Others, not quite so capable, will do so within two days, and within a week the most of them get out to the pole in good style. In the course of time the horses will learn to spring to the pole at night, quite unaided, while the men are scurrying down the sliding poles.

Were it not for the brightness and alertness of the horses there could be no such thing as the getting of a fire engine or truck into the street within the almost incredibly short time of seven seconds after the first sounding of the gong. The average working life of a fire horse is three years.

BICYCLE BUILT FOR TWENTY.

Huge Four-Wheeled Affair Being Constructed for a Brooklyn Club.

An Ohio firm is building for a Brooklyn bicycle club the biggest thing on wheels of its kind. This is a quadricycle, intended to carry the entire club—twenty members. The machine differs from all the many seated wheels of recent manufacture in some important respects. In the first place it will carry more persons by eight than its nearest rival. Again, it has four wheels instead of three. Finally, in the principles of its construction it is unique. To the unskilled eye this viginticycle, if it may be so called, looks like two tandems, built each for ten, ranged side by side. Several important mechanical features destroy this comparison. The riders will, it is true, sit in two parallel rows of ten, but the separate frames are joined together in a peculiar fashion, with ball and socket joints, closed top and bottom, but open at the sides so as to admit of free lateral action. This is necessary to secure uniformity of steerage and also to enable the machine to run within a reasonably small circle. The gear is seventy-two front sprocket, 100 rear. The machine is about eighteen feet long and four feet wide, and is to weigh about 600 pounds.

BICYCLE BEING BUILT FOR A BROOKLYN CLUB OF TWENTY MEMBERS.

Fourteen Despairing Brides.

At Hounslow yesterday there was a remarkable scene when the Fourth Hussars left by the 9:15 train for Southampton en route for India. A detachment of 400 men in full marching order, and under the command of Col Ramsey, proceeded from Hounslow barracks to the station, where they were awaited by an immense crowd of friends, chiefly females. Among the latter were fourteen brides of only a week's experience of married life, and these were in a most distressed condition, the poor women crowding together and clinging with the fondest affection to their husbands. The soldiers quickly entrained, and after the last good-bys had been spoken the train steamed out of the station, leaving the disconsolate brides weeping hysterically in a heap on the platform. The fourteen privates were married during the previous week without the consent of the colonel, and their wives were, therefore, not entitled to accompany them.—Westminster Gazette.

Chinamen as Shoemakers.

Chinese shoemakers are said to be patient, diligent and excellent workmen, while they are the keenest tradesmen in the world, bound together by a sort of freemasonry which takes the place of the patrotism that is lacking in the Chinese character.

They are a formidable class in foreign countries. Nine-tenths of the Chinese in Calcutta are shoemakers. In the Philippines they are monopolizing the trade. Out of the total of 784 shoemakers in Manilla, 630 are Chinamen.

In Mexico are shoe factories owned and managed by them, and they turn out goods at $2 a pair that, in point of workmanship, far exceed anything that could be produced in any European country at a considerably higher price. It is the same in Tonquin.

Training for Nurses.

In the nurse training schools of this country there were, in 1893, 2,710 persons engaged in learning the business of caring for the sick.

Every man feels the need of some agreeable person to grumble to.

Georgia's Convict Law.

The next General Assembly relative to the disposal of the convicts will provide for a general stockade system that will permit of the constant improvement of the country roads during workable weather and afford other means of employment during severe weather.

How best to settle the convict question has been the text of many lectures and innumerable editorials, and the trend of popular opinion is towards the above outlined plan. Clarke County is not to wait for the general measure, however, and it will have perfected a similar system long before the State machinery is put in motion. The Good Roads movement is constantly growing, and soon the State of Georgia will be as conspicuous for her graded highways as she is now for her dangerous gullies.—Banner, Athens, Ga.

Good Roads and Prosperity.

Good roads are as essential to the prosperity of the country as the proper machinery for cultivation is to the farmer. A farm that is easily accessible, by reason of good roads, is worth double to the owner what it would be otherwise. In no country are good roads so easily obtainable, with so little cost as they are here, and in no State is so little attention paid to them. Little chuckholes are left until they become dangerous, a plank breaks in a culvert and it goes until some valuable animal has become crippled. Road overseers start in some work by tearing up the road and then leave it unfinished for months while the public is compelled to drive around the obstruction. Our road laws are faulty, we admit, and under them it perhaps is impossible to have good highways, but at the same time it is within our power to elect men to the somewhat humble and not very lucrative office of road overseer who will take an interest in working the roads. Let property owners and neighbors in each respective district get together before election day, and decide upon some man who will fill the office right, and not leave it until the last day, and then perhaps by a dozen votes put some one in who cares little and has no interest whatever to prompt him.—Leader, Irving, Kan.

Winter Resort Roads.

The advantage of having good roads at summer resorts was never so strongly shown as during the present season. And what is true of northern summer resorts is equaly true of southern winter resorts.

The locality that can offer the very best roads will present a strong drawing card. People with enough money and leisure to go on extended outings, will, in most instances, desire to do more or less riding and driving. This is particularly true of winter resorts, inasmuch as boating constitutes a small part of winter pastimes.

Many of the southern towns and cities are realizing the true condition of things, and are taking steps toward making the needed improvements.

The wheelmen of Atlanta, Ga., are looking forward with no little interest to the reorganization of the Good Roads Club, which takes place on Oct. 16.

It is the intention of those at the head of the club to obtain the hearty co-operation of all wheelmen, and when this has been done and the club fully organized, it will be able to work much good in that city. The club has for its object, as its name indicates, the building of and keeping in repair good roads throughout that city and county.

Other towns in the "Sunny South" are looking after their best interests by providing fine streets and good roads. No town with highways of mud or sand need apply. People do not care to go on an outing and pay for such luxuries.

Cool Baths for Coughs.

A physician advises cool sponge baths twice a week in winter and oftener in summer for the cure of the common "children's catarrh." The baths should be given in a warm room and be followed by friction by rubbing to produce a glow. If they are not followed by a chilly feeling or headache, the reaction has been prompt and beneficial. The baths should be begun with warm water, changing gradually in succeeding baths to tepid, then cool water. It is well, too, to begin this treatment in the spring, summer or early autumn, rather than in midwinter. They will stimulate the circulation, prevent colds and act upon the nasal membrane, as upon the rest of the body, to promote its healthy action. Mothers with children suffering from catarrh should guard them zealously from colds in every way possible. Every access of inflammation upon such chronic cases is a good deal more than a temporary step backward.

Tartar Medicine.

Formerly musk was used as a medicine in various parts of the world; but doctors in civilized lands do not hold musk in high repute. In China it is still thought to be a very good medicine; but the Chinese have queer notions about cures and charms. Abee Muc, a distinguished traveler, says that when a Tartar doctor finds himself without his drugs and medicines, he is not in the least embarrassed. He writes the names of the needed drugs on slips of paper, and these, being rolled up in little balls, are swallowed by the sick man. "To swallow the name of a remedy, or the remedy itself," say the Tartars, "comes to precisely the same thing."—St. Nicholas.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DEKALB COUNTY

JAMES A. BARNES EDITOR.

Registered at the Auburn, Office as second-class matter

The latest news is that Indiana has gone republican, but the national election is in some doubt with chances in favor of McKinley. Robinson's majority is over 500.

How A Woman Paid Her Debts.

A lady in Lexington says: "I am out of debt; and thanks to the Dishwasher business. In the past six weeks I have made $530,00. Every housekeeper wants a Dishwasher, and any intelligent person can sell them with big profit to himself. The Dishwasher is lovely, you can wash and dry the family dishes in two minutes, and without wetting your hands. You can get particulars by addressing, The Mound City Dishwasher Co., St. Louis, Mo. There is big money in the business for an agent. I expect to clear $4,000 the coming year. I need the money, why not make it. Miss C, E. 5

Under the Cars.

Bert Depew, well known here in Auburn, was killed at Albion last night by a freight train running over him He was a railroad man, and we believe a freight conductor for the B. & O. He had gone up to Albion to attend the closing rally of the campaign as the "Big 4" were there that evening. After the meeting was over, he went down to the station, telling he was going to board a freight train for home. This morning his mangled remains were found on the track. It is supposed that he tried to get on a train, but missed his hold and fell under the wheels, It is possible that other trains ran over him before he was found.

Another Smart Woman.

My husband is poor but proud and he does not want me to work, as I have nothing to do I get restless, and after reading in your paper Mrs. Russell's experience selling self-heating flatirons I concluded I would try it. I wrote to J. F. Casey & Co., St Louis Mo., and they treated me so nicely that I felt very much encouraged. As soon as I got my sample iron I started out, and sold 8 irons the first day clearing $12. I have not sold less than 8 any day since, and one day I sold 17. I now have $226 clear money, and my husband does not know I have been working at all, but I am afraid he will be mad when I tell him. Have I done right or should I quit work and leave him to struggle alone.

AN ANXIOUS WIFE.

You are doing just right, your husband should be proud of you, go ahead and show the world what an energetic woman can do. That self-heating iron must be a wonderful seller, as we hear of so many that are succeeding selling it. 2

The Fruit Tree Swindle.

How it Has Been Worked in This State by a Very Smooth Operator.

A letter from Pinkerton's National Detective association to the Logansport police describes a swindler who has operated at Delphi and LaFayette within the past week. His method is simple and usually succeeds. He claims to represent a firm dealing in nursery stock and exhibits catalogues, letters, etc., purporting to be from said firm. The letter is usually the acknowledgment of the receipt of orders and refers to a check enclosed. He visits a store after banking hours and purchases a small bill of goods and tenders in payment a draft for $25, payable to his order, receiving in cash the difference between the amount of the draft and his purchase. He has given a different name in each place, but the drafts used are the same in every instance. The drafts purport to be by the Chicago City bank, 6225 Halstead street, or the First National bank, of Chicago. A rubber stamp is used in numbering and dating the drafts. A perforator is also used. The swindler is described as about 40 years old, weight 190, blond complexion, dark hair and mustache, height five feet ten inches, dark eyes and crooked nose.—Ex.

A Chance to Make Money.

I read how one of your subscribers make money selling Dishwashers; I ordered one, and my lady friends were charmed, as they hate dish washing. My brother and I commenced selling them, and have made $1,700 after paying all expenses. We don't canvass any. Our sales are all made at home. People come or send for them. The Mound City Dish Washer is the best Dishwasher on the market. Our business is increasing, and we are going to keep right on, until we make ten thousand dollars. We sell from 5 to 15 machines every day. The Dishwasher is lovely, every housekeeper wants one. There is no excuse to be poor when so much money can be made selling Dishwashers. For full particulars, address The Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. They will start you on the road to success.—A reader. 2

WE WIN

Sweeping Victory for Democracy in DeKalb.

MR W J BRYAN

May not Occupy the White House During the Coming Four Years.

The Entire County Ticket Elected Except Ralston for Sheriff.

RCBINSONS MAJORITY OVER 500.

Returns come in very slowly and no correct reports from the back precincts anywhere, till this forenoon, and still many are to hear from, McKinley is probably elected, as his strength seems to be in cities where the labor vote is large and the gold sentiment stranger than in the country. There are some back districts in some states that will not be known till Thursday.

As we go to press it appears that McKinley's majority will be less than at first reported. There is also a bare possibility that Bryan may carry Indiana. Dr. Nusbaum got over 500 majority in this county and fell short 350 in Noble, leaving him 150 ahead. Mr. Ralston is defeated by about 75. The other democratic county officers are elected by majorities from 300 to 500. Bryan carries the county by 505. We hear from nearly every part of the county, that slanderous stories were peddled among the people by men who seemed to make it a business, charging Rolston with immoral acts that he never committed. This was the vilest work of a dirty campaign.

NOTES.

Where are the "sound money" democrats? All gone over into the McKinley camp.

Now let the factories open up, and stop shipping off their goods in the night.

The "gold democrats" here will now be able to explain to their farmer patrons why they signed that paper pledging support to McKinley.

For that tired feeling that comes of late hours that bring only news of defeat, fish horns are a poor remedy. They are a worse dose than McKinley, only they don't last as long.

Now we will have a renewal of prosperity such as the gold standard has brought us for the past twenty years, and such as the McKinley high tax law brought us.

So much money never was used in this county before, as by the republicans, not even in the palmy days of the "blocks of five." But of all cudgels to deprive a man of his political independence, the threat of "no employment" seems to be the winner. We do not envy a man his feeling when he secures a job at so dear a price.

The following is a list of votes as far as received.

BUTLER.

Butler sent about forty people to Canton on the excursion last Thursday. They report a very nice trip and a grand reception at the McKinley home.

Diphtheria or some throat disease nearly allied to it broke out in our town last week from which four deaths have already occurred. No new cases are reported at this writing and several old cases are convalescent.

J. A. Campbell had an unpleasant experience last week. One of his patrons had a small damage by fire in a tenanted dwelling that had all the appearance of fraud on part of the occupant. He used all due dilligence to get the loss disposed of with the intention of going off when that was done. On his way to adjust the loss he learned that some miscreant had burned the house down two nights after the failure of the first attempt.

K. A. Johnson's tenant dwelling at Corunna burned about a week ago, attended by many features similar to the above loss.

Nancy Kenedy's dwelling one mile west of Spencerville on the Wasson farm, burned last week. The extent of the loss not known at this writing.

The campaign closed in Butler last Monday with a grand display forensic effort and ere this appears in print the result of this unprecedential contest will be heralded far and wide.

If only right and the best interest of our people is secured we will all unite in thankfulness.

Edward Proctor, you all know Ed, the jolly hunter and all around good fellow who has never been known to smile or even look at a young lady, has actually been caught by a jolly widow. She carefully conceals the mysterious tactics employed, but Ed was caught. They were married last week and went to Canton for a wedding tour.

The children that have died from sore throat, are Mrs. Susie Prosser's little girl aged about four years, two children of O. Warner and a child of Charley Madden.

Charles W. Campbell, and Otto Gengnagle are attending school at Angola.

E. V. Campbell is home from Toledo Medical College to attend election.

Ed Crain, C. S. Stoy and many others are home to attend election.

Marry This Girl Quick.

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad oder and saves oil, it is easy to sell. If you wish to try it send 13 cent stamps to Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A. St. Louis, Mo, and she will send you sample outfit, this is a good way to make money around home.

tf MISS TINA W.

A Chance to Make Money

I have made $1.640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. H. tf

NOW IS THE TIME TO PLAN FOR YOUR WINTER TRIP TO CALIFORNIA.

On November 4th the Wabash R. R., in connection with the A., T. & S. F. R. R., Will inaugurate a line of vestibuled sleeping cars between St. Louis and Los Angeles, Cal., without change. These sleepers will leave St. Louis every Wednesday and Saturday night at 9:15 P. M., after arrival of Wabash trains from Chicago. Toledo and Detroit, arriving Los Angeles Saturday and Tuesdays at 6;05 P. M. For full particulars, write to Wabash Ticket Agent, or C. S. Crane, G. P. & T. A., St. Louis, Mo. 46

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A M Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

Children Cry for Pitcher's Castoria.

The Wonderful Churn.

I want to add my testimony to the list of those that have used the Lightning Churn. It does all that is claimed of it; you can churn easily in one minute and get a large percentage more butter than with the common churns. I never took the agency for anything before, but so many of my neighbors wanted churns that I ordered 30 and they are all gone. I think in a year nearly every farmer will have a Lightning Churn, in fact they can't afford to be without one as they make so much more butter, and a good little bit of money can be made in every township selling these churns. By writing to J. F. Casey & Co., St. Louis, Mo., you can get circulars and full particulars about the churn. A READER. 3

BISHOP & LACKEY,

LEADING MERCHANTS.

Obituary.

Robert L., son of John A. and Martena (McDonald) Douglass, was born in Belle Plaine, Kansas, June 13, 1877, died at the home of his parents near the same place, Oct. 25, 1896, age 19 years, 4 month and 12 days.

Robert was a bright, intelligent young man, and from his earliest childhood his character was manifest in his nobility of soul and self-sacrifice, his love for doing for others was wonderfully marked, and in return he was loved by all who knew him.

He had only recently taken up the study of medicine and was studying to qualify for a doctor, when he was stricken with typhoid fever, and was called from earth to enter life eternal. The evidence left us as he neared the river of death, that "I am going home," and the virtuous life he always led in the Sabbath school, the church and home is sufficient to saying he indeed was a christian. When death dews had stamped his features his voice was heard singing "My Jesus, I Love Thee," his spirit there wafted its way to find rest in Jesus. He leaves father, mother, five sisters and two brothers to mourn his early death. At this place he also left many relatives, among them a sister.

Lay him down beneath the daisies,
Close the lovely eyes to sleep;
Bright with sweet angelic phases,
Closed for heaven why should we weep?

Resolutions of Respect.

The committee appointed by the Lutheran Sunday school of Sedan to draft resolutions upon the death of a sister and classmate, Miss Madonna DeLong, submit the following:

Since it has pleased God in his all wise providence to remove a sister and classmate of our school we do

Resolve, that although she has been cut down in her usefulness we will bow to the divine decree and say, God meant it all for good, since his mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, and that we will all endeavor to work the harder to fill the vacant place of our departed sister.

Resolved, that we extend our sincere sympathy to the bereaved family and friends who are thus bereft of a dear daughter and sister and that we will also try to live that we may meet her again.

Resolved, that these resolutions be recorded in the minutes of the school and published in two of the county papers and a copy sent to the bereaved family.

Marry This Girl Somebody!

I have been reading in your paper about several men and women, that have been very successful selling self-heating flat-irons, and I concluded I would see what a girl could do I have worked 12 days and have sold 151 irons and have $218 left after paying all expenses. Everybody is delighted with it, as people think they can't afford to be without one as they save fuel and time and don't burn the clothes. I know I can clear five thousand dollars in a year. How is that for a girl? A GRADUATE.

Splendid, my girl, splendid, you are a true American girl. Someone can get complete information about the self-heating iron by addressing J F. CASEY & CO., ST. LOTIS MO. It seems to be a winner, as everybody selling it writes in its praise. 3

Mound City Dish Washer fills this bill. With it you can wash and dry the dishes for a family of ten in two minutes without wetting your hands. As soon as people see the Washer work they want one. You can make more money and make it quicker than with any household article on the market. I feel convinced that any lady or gentleman can make from $10 to $14 per day around home. Subscribers to the Weekly COURIER are getting careless and allowing their dues to get way behind. This is not wisdom nor justice. A Churn That Churns in One Minute

I have been in the dairy business all my life and have many times churned for an hour before butter would appear, so when I heard of a churn that would churn in a minute, I concluded to try it Every day for a week I used it, and not only could I churn in a minute, but I got more and better butter than with the common churn. This is very important information to butter makers. The churn works easily and will churn an ordinary churning in less than sixty seconds. I have sold two dozen of these churns in the past month, Every butter maker that has seen me churn in less than a minute bought one. You can obtain all desired information regarding the churn by addressing J. F. Casey & Co., St Louis Mo., and they will give you prompt and courteous attention.

NOW TO PREVENT CROUP.

SOME READING THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO YOUNG MOTHERS. HOW TO GUARD AGAINST THE DISEASE

Croup is a terror to young mothers and to post them concerning the cause, first symptoms and treatment is the object of this item. The origin of croup is a common cold. Children who are subject to it take cold very easily and croup is almost sure to follow. The first symp on is hoarseness: this is soon followed by a peculiar rough cough, which is easily recognized and will never be forgotten by one who has heard it. The time to act is when the child first becomes hoarse. If Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is freely given all tendency to croup will soon disappear. Even after the croupy cough has developed it will prevent the attack. There is no danger in giving this remedy for it contains nothing injurious. For sale by Davenport the Druggist. 48

SIX weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. WM. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by. Davenport the Druggist. 48

Sarsaparilla Sense.

Any sarsaparilla is sarsaparilla. True. So any tea is tea. So any flour is flour. But grades differ. You want the best. It's so with sarsaparilla. There are grades. You want the best. If you understood sarsaparilla as well as you do tea and flour it would be easy to determine. But you don't. How should you? When you are going to buy a commodity whose value you don't know, you pick out an old established house to trade with, and trust their experience and reputation. Do so when buying sarsaparilla.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla has been on the market 50 years. Your grandfather used Ayer's. It is a reputable medicine. There are many Sarsaparillas—but only one Ayer's. It cures.

St. Peter and Bryan

The other day, two bright little boys on West Seventh whose identity we will keep quiet by calling them Leonard and Kirby, were talking about heaven and the best way of getting in there. Leonard asserted that when we arrive at the walls of the New Jerusalem, Saint Peter will be at the door to let us in." "Saint Peter?" said Kirby, "who is Saint Peter?" Leonard explained and then Kirby settled it by saying, "Well, I'll bet you you that Bryan will be there first and he'll get in at the front door." Children have great faith both in politics and religion.

Honorable Thieving.

Some unknown person entered the cornfield of Sam Gibson last night and helped themselves to about ten bushels of nice yellow corn. There were about a hundred bushels of white corn husked on the ground but the thief did not take this but went to several shocks and husked out the above number of bushels of yellow corn not molesting the corn that was husked. It must have been a "gold-bug" who wanted Sam's corn or he would have helped himself to the white corn.

Churning Done in One Minute.

I have tried the Lightning Churn, you recently described in your paper, and it is certainly a wonder. I can churn in less than one minute, and the butter is elegant, and you get considerably more butter than when you use a common churn. I took the agency for the churn here and every butter maker that sees it buys one. I have sold three dozen and they give the best of satisfaction. I know I can sell 100 in this township, as they churn so quickly, make so much more butter than common churns, and are so cheap. Some one in every township can make two or three hundred dollars selling these churns. By addressing J F. Casey & Co, St. Louis, you can get circulars and full information so you can make big money right at home. I have made $80 the past two weeks and I have never sold anything in my life before.

HOW MUSICIANS POSE

ATTITUDES ASSUMED BY DEVOTEES OF THE DIVINE ART.

Attitudinizing as a Part of the Business—The Musical Director and the Drum Major—The Pianist and the Cornet Player.

An Art of Itself.

Exactly why musical performers should feel it their duty to attitudinize as well as to play or sing is one of those curious problems presented by the complexity of our civilization to which a definite answer is not easy to give, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Music, according to the most highly inspired of poets, is a heavenly gift, appealing directly to the soul, while the striking of attitudes is an earthly acquisition, gained through much practice and appealing to nothing in particular, unless it may be in an indirect way to the pocketbooks of the beholders. It is quite possible that at some time in the history of the divine art, men and women played and sang without posing in such a way as to attract more attention by their attitudes than by their music, but that day, if it ever existed, has long gone by, and music at present is as much a matter of pose as of tone, and appeals in many cases quite as strongly to the eye as to the ear. It is quite possible that this fact may have grown out of the conscious superiority that every musician and singer feels in regard to all other persons, no matter of what class, rank or condition—the feeling that one divinely endowed with the gift of music should take precedence of all others of the human race. Nor does this feeling demand, as a previous condition, much of an endowment, for it may sometimes be observed among musical folk that the less they know about music the more conceited they are apt to be about their attainment in this direction, as the leading soprano in a volunteer church choir often gives herself more airs than Patti, and the old darky who fiddles for all the dances in a country neighborhood not infrequently regards his own musical attainments as more profound than those of Paganini.

Leaving the quantity and quality of musical knowledge and skill out of the question for the time being, however, the attitudes struck by musical people of different lines furnish a curious and exceedingly interesting subject of study, as going to show that the musical art of the present day is felt and acknowledged to be as much a matter of pose as of melody or harmony. That this statement is true is readily susceptible of proof. No artist would be willing to play or sing behind a screen for an audience in front. It is possible that, persuading himself under such circumstances by a sort of legal fiction, he was quite alone, the pianist might pour forth his soul through his finger tips, and give much better renditions of the works he sought to interpret than he would when consciously playing for effect, but he would not be willing to try. No orchestra, no body of singers, would be willing to go through their performance behind a curtain, unseeing and unseen, and yet, theoretically, this ought to be the most satisfactory method of rendering a musical work, for, in this case, the singers and players would be undisturbed by the sight of the sea of faces before them, and the audience could enjoy the music without having their attention called away by the personality of the performers. No more than the singers and players, however, would the audience be satisfied with the screen and curtain arrangement, for the people who gather at a concert want to see how the chorus looks, and whether its members are as old and ugly as those of the grand opera chorus, and what sort of person the prima donna assoluta is, and what she has on, and how it fits, and how many men are in the male chorus, and how wide they can open their mouths. Even a theater [illegible] in a place of entertainment where the music is merely subordinate and incidental to the main attraction, want to see the orchestra, gaze upon the bald back of the leader's bald head, watch the facial convulsions of the man whose business it is to pierce the atmosphere with the upper notes of the piccolo, and sympathize with the man who extracts dying groans from the double bass. So the posing business seems to be quite satisfactory to both artists and their audiences, and so long as each party is content, it is not easy to see why any one else has a right to complain.

Of musical folk, the most competent posers for effect are the artists of the lyric drama. Posing is their business, and not infrequently they devote more attention to their attitudes than to their music, as reckoning that any deficiency in the latter will be condoned by the audience on account of proficiency in the former. They have abundant facilities for exercising all their gifts in this direction, and the only criticism that can be justly made on their efforts is that they fall into regulation attitudes, which are in accordance with the traditions of the stage, and have been in use so long that they have come to be considered indispensable to the proper rendition of the part. Nobody, for instance, ever saw an actor play the heavy villain without bending his legs at a sharp angle and walking about on the stage as though afflicted with chronic anchylosis of the knee joints, for crooked knee joints and heavy villainy go together, and the former naturally suggest the latter. So, no one ever saw a lover and his sweetheart on the lyric stage wind up an amorous duet without leaning against each other, the hands of the heroine clasped in an attitude of wild despair, while the hero throws one arm around her clinging form and extends the other in midair, while the twain jointly emit a screech that makes you involuntarily feel for your scalp. It is not madness; it is merely attitudinizing, and the closer they lean together and the more earpiercing the concluding yell the more ardent is the expression of their undying affection and the greater their detestation of the deep-dyed villain with his much-bent knees.

Next in posing ability to the operatic artists come the pianists. They do not enjoy the same facilities for posing, because, being confined by the nature of their art to one spot, they cannot caper about the stage and transfix the audience with astonishment at their ability to turn round on their toes a dozen times without once falling down, but they make the most of their opportunities, under all the circumstances, really do very well, and from their initial triple bows to the boxes and parquet to their "Exit, Right," furnish their patrons with a very passable show. Lady pianists are always expected to furnish a preliminary entertainment with their gloves, which, after spending half an hour in pulling on in the dressing room, require five minutes to pull off after being seated at the piano. The gentlemen of this profession, not wearing gloves on entering, do a little stage business with the piano. No matter where it is placed, it is always a little too far one way or the other, and the services of the two uniformed Matebeles appertaining to the establishment must be brought into requisition to make it right, while the pianist cheerfully tackles the bossing of the job. Of course, they always push it too far, and then pull it back too far, so that a good deal of careful manipulation is required to place it exactly right; but the pianist does not object to working overtime, the audience is always patient, for they know perfectly well what to expect, and that it is quite impossible for the artist to play until his instrument has been successfully established over a certain crack in the floor, and the Matebeles have nothing to say about it, so everybody is satisfied. Confinement to the piano stool after the manual and pedal performance has actually begun does not limit, though it hampers, the posing of the performer. Before actually beginning the program he may run over the keys, and then give the stool a hitch as the stage sailor does his pantaloons; during thoughtful, tender passages he may lift his eyes heavenward, as though gazing into infinite vacuity, so that the women in the audience may see how intense is his inspiration, and during the Scherzo he may sway back and forth, throw his coat tails about and kick under the piano as though driving out an imaginary canine which had taken refuge there, and all these gyrations will be regarded as the outward and visible signs of an inward and musical genius. They are looked for by the audience, who have made up their minds to endure them as placidly as possible, knowing that they are absolutely essential to the proper rendition of a piano composition, whether Nocturne by the dreamy Chopin, Moonlight Sonata by the rugged Beethoven, or Rhapsodie Hongroise by the incomprehensible Listz.

The director of a musical organization, no matter of what grade, has opportunities for posing somewhat superior to those of the pianist and somewhat inferior to those of the operatic hero, and is allowed liberties not permitted to either of the others. It is understood that he is always to keep the audience waiting for five minutes after the last straggling fiddler has straggled in, taken his seat and tuned his fiddle. This is the director's privilege and he avails himself of it to the uttermost. He takes it for granted that the public will be sufficiently entertained by listening to the tone as given out by the clarionet man, and immediately succeeded by scrapings and blowings in every key that Bach discovered for the well-tempered clavichord, so he relies on the rest of the orchestra to furnish the fun for a reasonable, sometimes an unreasonable, time, then enters with a strut as dignified as that of a turkey gobbler and as imposing as that of a peacock, hears with satisfaction the thunder of applause given by a tired audience glad of any change, and with deprecatory bow calmly appropriates to himself the credit due the entire organization.

The drum major is commonly regarded as a caricature of the orchestra director, but this is a mistake. He is an institution of himself, the darling of the street, the envy of the policeman, the admiration of all beholding small boys, who feel that to be a drum major is greater than to be a king. Every street band is properly gauged by the drum major, and the bigger this personage, the taller his mighty hat, the longer his big-headed cane and the more tricks he can do with it without letting it fall the better the band. He is strictly ornamental, for his cane keeps no time, and after its first premonitory jab into the atmosphere as a signal for the band to turn itself loose on the public, none of the players pay him the slightest attention. But for this fact he cares nothing, as it is generally understood that he owns, in fee simple, not only the band, but also the whole parade which it precedes; that, in fact, the public demonstration has been arranged in his honor, and especially that he may allow the glories of his uniform to gladden the eyes of his fellow-men.

Compared with the drum major, the artist who comes before the public with an Amati or Stradivarius under his arm is a mere trifler in the art of posing. He does his best, it is true, stands first on one foot, then on the other, while he delicately tunes his lyre, so to speak, and waits for the piano man to get up steam, and then gracefully sways back and forth as he tortures his unfortunate instrument into emitting shrieks of agony, but his opportunities are limited, and unless he breaks a string, thus gaining a chance to show what a variety of squeaks he can compel the others to utter, he is at a discount. Even the cornet man is better off than he, for the professional whose interest and pleasure it is to stuff wind into an E flat cornet is able to distort his face, roll up his forehead into laps and assume an expression of intense agony that never fails to excite the sympathy of all beholders. His rival in this form of spectacular entertainment is the man with the big horn, who makes faces, not from choice, but of necessity; for the labor of filling so enormous a receptacle with air and keeping it full is so great as to draw drops of perspiration from even the baldest and most poreless cranium. Of all the list he poses least in a conscious way, but most unconsciously. He has not time to think of posing, for if he did his horn would get empty and surcease from its labors. The man who nightly thumps a drum on the street as a means of grace, the blind man who uses an accordion in his efforts to attract the attention of the charitable and induce them to pay him to stop, may pose in a humble way, and frequently do so, but the big horn blower has both hands and his mouth full, and, though innocently a spectacle, is, unconsciously, an object of sympathetic regard. He might pose if he could, but he cannot. He alone, of the whole musical fraternity, makes no conscious effort to attract public attention, though he deserves more than even the drum major, for without a big horn the largest orchestra would be a thing unbalanced and out of joint.

Thomas Corwin.

Thomas Corwin was born in 1794. In his prime, life in this country had a local, bucolic, and primitive flavor, which in politics was grotesquely exaggerated. Clay was commended to the people by the fact that he was the "mill-boy of the slashes;" in the campaign of 1840 the Whigs showed their love of the people and their sympathy with simplicity of life in public men by putting up log-cabins and serving out hard cider from them; Corwin, having had to find employment in early life by driving a wagon-load of provisions for the army in the war of 1812, was, later on, favorably known in politics as "the Wagon-boy." The Ohio community of Corwin's boyhood was a community of pioneers—their dwellings of logs. The presiding justice first selected for the southwestern circuit of Ohio was not a lawyer, but qualified himself for admission to the bar by practice in his judicial capacity. The salary attached to the office was seven hundred and fifty dollars; at the bar the highest professional income was one thousand dollars. The common dress was of homespun or buckskin; a professional man wore black and shaved himself. Corwin throughout his life was "Tom" Corwin. In 1828 one James Shields, a Jacksonian, was nominated for Congress against Corwin. In order to damage him irretrievably a certificate was published to the effect that prominent men of his own party had declared, among other things, that it was his habit, on going to bed, to exchange his cambric shirt for a night shirt, and Corwin afterward confessed that it was this charge that gave him his first hope of an election, as he felt confident that Jacksonian Democrats would never unite in support of a man who was too good to sleep in the same shirt he wore during the day. He once confided to some young man, who asked what course he ought to pursue to achieve success in public life, "Be as solemn as an ass." But he did not guide his life by this axiom. His declaration in the Senate that were he a Mexican he would offer his own countrymen a welcome with bloody hands to hospitable graves has become an oratorical commonplace. His translation of the impression produced by the nomination of Polk for the Presidency, "After that—who is safe?" is one of those jokes which are sure of a long life. In fact, he is remembered rather as a wit than as a statesman.

Some Humors of Marriage.

Scarcely a week passes without bringing news of some couple who have found it necessary to emigrate temporarily generally into Wisconsin, but sometimes into Indiana, in order to get married.

It is one of the curiosities of the law that in one and the same place—here in Illinois, for example—it arrays all sorts of difficulties about the process of getting married, while leaving the way to getting unmarried comparatively unobstructed.

Beofre a youthful couple who sigh profoundly for an opportunity to become disenchanted with each other can enter upon the disenchanting process they must, if of less than a certain age, get the consent of their parents and comply with certain conditions about license or banns, and all this at the cost of some money and trouble and embarrassment. It's all well enough. The law ought to stand guard over marriages, only it might well take more pains to see that they are prudent. It does nothing in that way now. But it pays so much regard to the prejudices and obstinacy of certain people who are not directly concerned at all as to drive the industry out of the State into communities where the theory seems to be that marriage concerns nobody but the contracting pair.

The oddest part of the whole affair is that parents should persist in the obsolete notion that they have a right to say something about it. They ought to have learned by this time that there are some things which we can do for others and some things which each one of us can do for himself or herself alone. They ought to have found out that it is no more possible for them to choose or reject a wife or a husband for their son or daughter than it is possible for them to digest the dinner that son or daughter may eat.

As to having their consent asked or being consulted about the matter in advance, why—that's preposterous. They should be grateful if they learn about it in time to provide for themselves proper wedding garments.—Chicago Chronicle.

"How are you getting along with the bicycle?" asked Miss Cayenne. "Better than I expected," replied Willie Wishington. "So you have at last attempted to ride?" "No; I haven't gone quite that far. But I don't believe I'm quite as much afraid of it as I used to be."—Washington Star.

WOMAN'S REALM

AGAIN THE HOOPSKIRT.

OF ALL revivals of bygone fashions perhaps that which would be least foreseen is the revival of the hoopskirt. Yet even this cumbersome reminder of grandmotherly frivolity is again to be established as a respectable feature of costume. As yet it has not thoroughly made its way into society. Most of the autumn gowns have skirts that are distended with nothing more formidable than silk or crinoline. And for some time the fearfully and wonderfully made affair of steel wire is not likely to make its way into the street. Through the medium of evening gowns, hoopskirts are making their first appearance. And there could be no wiser method of introducing the fashion, for an evening costume of rich brocade or sheer tulle is probably even prettier when the skirt stands out with unnatural stiffness. An exquisite evening gown of white brocade that was recently worn at Newport covered a hoopskirt in a most attractive way. The neck was cut very low, the bodice was rather short and the sleeves were tiny straps over the shoulders.

Old Sol a Hair Bleacher.

The idea of utilizing the sun's rays to bleach the human hair is a novel one, yet it has become all the fashion in some of the Eastern fashionable circles. The discovery that such a thing was possible was made by a typical "summer girl" during the last season. Having been affected by nature with raven tresses, which were then out of style in the set in which she moved, she applied to a fashionable physician for relief. He recommended bright sunshine and sea ozone as the best means of making the hair light colored, healthy and strong. The young person for whom this prescription was given found it very efficacious.

The end of the resort season has by no means caused a subsidance of the fad. Never before were there in New York so many young women whose golden hair hangs down their backs once every day—that is, every sunshine day. A queer fact, too, is that the idea, simple as it is, seems to have the result of producing the desired effect. It is certainly a much more harmless way of bleaching the hair than that which requires the use of chemicals.

A Kansas Girl's Acceptance.

A young man in Kansas, after "keeping company" with the girl of his choice, managed one evening to summon up the courage necessary to pop the momentous question. He was somewhat disappointed at not receiving an immediate and glad acceptance, for he had been led to believe from the young woman's actions that his attentions were not unwelcome to her. Instead she replied that she would notify him by mail. After spending a week in suspense he received a letter from her, 3,000 words in length. In it she explained her position on the tobacco question, stated what she had always advocated as the best kind of baking powder, told him that it was with a feeling of deep gratification that she accepted the honor he had done her and hoped that she would always faithfully preserve the traditions of good housekeeping, etc. He was nearly dead with exhaustion when he read the postscript, which read: "You are so full of politics I thought it might please you to be accepted like the candidates accept their Presidential nominations."

Silk Underwear Not Healthful.

Opinions differ as to the comfort derived from the different materials from which underwear is made, but there is one thing, says a medical contemporary, which admits of no doubt, and this is that while silk is exceedingly warm, soft and pleasant to the flesh, it is at the same time by no means the healthiest substance for the undergarment. In proof of this, practical observation has demonstrated that silk stockings will make the toughest and healthiest feet moist, wet and tender, until walking becomes painful. A silk scarf worn around the neck next to the skin will, in nine wearers out of ten, produce sore throat. Silk makes the neck hot and moist, and the first stray breath of cool air that strikes the skin feels like a drop of iced water, and will produce a cold. Silk seems to have the faculty, as contrasted with wool, of opening the pores and inciting perspiration; and if it will do this with the feet and neck there is every reason to believe that it will produce equal susceptibility to cold when worn about the chest and limbs. Those who wear silk stockings invariably have tender feet. The rule that applies to the male applies equally to the female. Silk underclothing may be very comfortable, but perhaps the advocates of dress reform would do as much good if they would discuss carefully the hygienic value of the material, as well as the cut and style, of the undergarment.

Study of "Problem Novels."

Mrs. M. B. Stone, of St. Louis, told the Professional Woman's League of New York the other day that she was President of a club which made its sole object the reading of new novels, especially what are called the "problem" novels, and that she hopes to establish branch clubs which shall preach the gospel of progressiveness in literature, for she declares that the idea that all new literature is merely a copy of the old is nonsense. "Universities are largely to blame for this false impression," said the speaker. "Ask yourself what possible benefit a child can derive from the study of Shakspeare's 'Twelfth Night,' which is on the program as one of the studies in literature. The children are required to read literature that is coarse and impure, and which should really be suppressed, simply because it is of 'the old works.' I am no prude, but something should be done about it." In closing Mrs. Stone said: "In fact, we are more of a problem club than a literary one. I read the new novels through carefully and mark passages for discussion that deal with everyday occurrences in the social problem. We find that it is really helpful in our daily lives."

Velvet Wrap Embroidered in Jet.

To Cure the Blushing Habit.

Many women of experience in society, as well as the debutante during her first season, are afflicted with a propensity to blush scarlet on the slightest provocation. These will be glad to learn that a remedy has been discovered for the disease—for disease it has been pronounced by eminent physicians all over the world. A London practitioner finds the complaint prevalent among members of both sexes, and for several years he has been treating many men as well as women. He relates the case of a young man employed in a large draper's shop who whenever asked by a lady customer to show goods was in the habit of blushing and stammering violently. Furthermore, in the case of certain goods he was wholly unable to transact any business at all. Several complaints had been made of this weakness on the part of the young man, and the matter culminated in his receiving a week's wages and his dismissal, to say nothing of a torrent of abuse from his late master.

A very interesting case was that of a young lady who recently wrote to him in great distress. She, too, was in the habit of blushing to the roots of her hair whenever spoken to; and her chief trouble lay in this fact that, owing to this same blushing habit, several young men of her acquaintance—with the conceit of youth—rather fancied that she was in love with them, whereas she regarded them with perfect indifference. This was a really difficult case.

One would think that commercial travelers were the very last men in the world to need any treatment, yet the doctor in question numbers among his patients several knights of the road. Now, clearly, the persuasive tongue and alluring samples of the traveler avail him nothing. He cannot refrain from becoming a lively crimson directly he confronts a possible buyer.

It is an interesting fact that the number of blushing doctors is increasing, and it is, undoubtedly, a better paying profession than that of the ordinary medical practitioner.

Ancient Coffee Houses.

Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," 1621, speaks of Turkish coffee houses. In 1632 Sir Henry Blount, who wrote a book of travels in the Levant, mentions Turkish coffee with praise. Evelyn describes drinking it at college in the rooms of a Levant friend, and Antony Wood tells that in 1650 (ten years before the restoration) a Levant Hebrew opened a coffee house at Oxford.

When Gunpowder Explodes.

The explosion of ordinary gunpowder is so sudden for a moment that part of the gun around the powder charge has to hold the big volume of gas squeezed down under enormous pressure until the shot can make a start to get out of the end of the gun to make room for the gas. It, therefore, gunpowder could be made to burn more slowly, so that it would not all be burnt until the shot reached the muzzle, the strain would be distributed all along the gun. Such powder was made first in Germany, but in spite of the fact that its manufacture was secret other countries analyzed it and soon made it better than Germany.

SUFFERING IN SILENCE.

Women are the real heroes of the world. Thousands on thousands of them endure the dragging torture of the ills peculiar to womankind in the silence of home. They suffer on and on—weeks, months, years. The story of weakness and torture is written in the drawn features, in the sallow skin, in the listless eyes, in the lines of care and worry on the face.

Inborn modesty seals their lips. They prefer pain to humiliation. Custom has made them believe the only hope of relief lies in the exposure of examination and "local treatment."

Take ten cases of "female weakness" and in nine of them "local treatment" is unnecessary. There is no reason why modest, sensitive women should submit to it. McELREE'S SISTERS.

Cawnpore, Sept. 13, 189—.

"Dear Miss Barton—May I venture to hope that you have not quite forgotten the friendship which made last summer—to me at least—so exceedingly pleasant? It is with the thought of your kindness still fresh in my memory that I dare to ask that question which has been growing more and more important to my mind ever since I left home. Will you be my wife? I feel I am asking much of you, but, indeed, I ask in all humility, knowing I have nothing to offer in exchange but a most sincere affection and a great desire to make you happy, and if I can in any degree succeed in that I shall be always yours most gratefully.

"DANIEL MERTON."

Upford Rectory, Norfolk,
Sept. 30, 189—.

"Dear Major Merton—I was very much surprised by your letter, as it had never struck me that you looked upon me as anything but a friend. But I, too, have pleasant memories of the summer, and I feel that I should be contented as your wife, however deeply I might miss my dear home and all the sad and happy associations with which this place is connected, and which must always make it dearer to me than any other in the world. My father has written to you, I know, so I need say no more. I am yours very sincerely,

"CONSTANCE BARTON."

"Mother," said Constance, a few days after writing this letter, "I cannot do it."

"But, my dearest, you must! You know it is only a week to the day you start, and your passage is taken, and all; and your trousseau has gone, and it is really quite easy; and Colonel and Mrs. Gore will look after you, and——"

"What is the good of talking, mother? You know I would travel anywhere; it is the thought of meeting him at the end."

"Yes, dear," sighed Mrs. Barton. "I quite understand; but you won't mind in a little while. It will soon wear off."

"But it will not! How often must I tell you that this is no sudden freak? I have thought about it for weeks and weeks."

"Why did you not tell me, then?" said the mother, reproachfully.

"Because I could not be certain what I could endure. Yes"—answering a startled look in her hearer's face—"endure. I meant to marry him without loving him; it seemed quite easy, but—last night I found——"

"My dear Constance, go on! What could have influenced you last night?"

"We were coming home from choir practice, and the sun was setting just as we got to the top of the hill—and I stopped at the gate into the first field and watched the sun go down behind the fir trees and the mists come over the fields—and—I found I could not leave it."

"What! Leave what?"

"That gate, mother! No, you cannot understand it; you never would—so just try and forgive me, if you can."

"Constance, surely you cannot be thinking—After all these years!"

"No, mother; I never think, as you say, after all these years. The present is quite enough to think about, and—do you understand? I will not go out to India! I will not marry Major Merton, and so—will you tell my father, or shall I?"

"I will!"

Mrs. Barton went down the stairs with a heavy heart, and on reaching her husband's study sank into the first chair and sighed.

"Constance refuses to marry Major Merton!"

The rector gasped, but before he could say a word an indignant girlish voice broke in from the other end of the room.

"It is a shame! How dare she?"

"Are you there, Maud?" said Mrs. Barton. "Never mind; I should have had to tell you. I think it is a great pity."

"A pity! (scornfully). It is disgraceful. And how—how will he bear it? To have his love treated like that. She took it as though it were her right, and now she flings it away without thinking of his heart—breaking——" and something very like a sob sounded through the room.

"Don't be silly, Maud!" said her mother, in the tone which betrays how familiar is the sentence, and Maud had heard it all her life in response to her most enthusiastic ideas, as well as to her daily chatter, so its effect was small.

Her father and mother began to consider the position. Major M[illegible] on expecting a bride; their friends, Colonel and Mrs. Gore, waiting to escort Constance to Bombay and be present at the wedding; and, most important to the female mind, the trousseau, which was already on its way to Brindisi. What was to be done?

"Wire to Major Merton," suggested the rector. "'No, Constance;' or 'Constance refuses.'"

"No," said Mrs. Barton, decidedly. "The Gores must take our letters, and when he sees them alone on the steamer half the force of the blow will be broken; he will see something is wrong and that will be much better than a telegram."

"Yes," said Maud, "because he will not have to wait a fortnight for the explanation."

"Of course," said Mrs. Barton, pitifully, "though that had not struck me. And, by-the-bye, Maud, this will put an end to your Indian trip," and her mother looked bewildered.

"Why?" said Maud, quickly, and the sharp tones of her voice reduced the confused objections surging in her parents' minds into a feeble "It would not do." But through the long argument that followed, they found her imperious "Why not?" so difficult to answer, that she left them in the end saying wonderingly to each other, "And why not?"

The Ganges was steaming into Bombay harbor early one December morning. The passengers, most of them returning from leave, stood on deck watching for Malabar Hill and other familiar landmarks, full of the excitement of a return to that land which however they might call England "home," held most of their life's interests.

Colonel and Mrs. Gore were there, looking rather distracted as they thought of the unpleasant task which lay before them. Maud had disappeared below on some excuse, somewhat to their relief; they felt the sight of the offending bride's sister would not be likely to soothe matters with the forsaken bridegroom.

Maud, in an agony of suspense and half-shamed disgust with herself, was looking with misty eyes out of one of the portholes, when she heard a hasty step behind her, and before she had time to wonder who it was a voice she knew was saying in eager tones:

"Constance! How glad I am!"—She turned and faced—Major Merton. He looked disconcerted for a minute, and then went on: "I beg your pardon, Miss—er—Maud, I suppose I may say, but your figures are so much alike; and where is Constance?"

Poor Maud saw that all her strategems had been useless. She, of all people, had to tell him the bitter truth; she who all the voyage had pictured him having brain fever, ending probably in madness, when he learned how Constance had treated him. She was very young!

She hung her head like a naughty schoolgirl, feeling intolerably guilty, but something must be said, and gathering all her courage together she began:

"I cannot tell you how sorry I am. I am ashamed of Constance," and as Major Merton smiled in utter misconception of her meaning—"yes, ashamed that she is my sister, for, oh, Major Merton!—she is not—she won't—marry you!"

And all her composure fled before the sternness which gathered in his eyes, and, like a little coward, she began to cry. For a few minutes there was a dead silence, broken only by the sound of her sobs, and then a strong sunburned hand was laid on hers, and a very kindly voice said:

"My dear child, why should you cry? It is not your fault, you would not—have not done this thing, and really"—as this did not seem to have any effect—"it is much better that your sister should have found out her feelings, even, as it seems to me, rather late in the day."

"But it is shameful," sobbed Maud; "you will despise us all. It is so cool of her, you know."

Major Merton almost smiled.

"I could not despise her, and as for you—how could I despise you? I think you are sorry for me, and if those tears are for my pain, I cannot have another one. We all have disappointments sometimes, and I hope I know how to bear one."

Maud looked up through her tears again and wondered how Constance could have done this thing. She had never thought that he would bear it as he had; in her own mind she had expected him to stagger—turn white—and perhaps groan a little. She had always heard that a man's tears were so terrible to witness! Secretly, she felt a trifle disappointed when she thought over the scene which she had so often imagined.

However, there was no time for more to be said, for the Gores arrived in the saloon, half vexed and half relieved to gather from the looks of the pair before them that the dreaded disclosure was over, and that nothing remained for them to do but deliver the letters with which they had been intrusted, and let Major Merton depart as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Gore and Maud had been schoolfellows and were great friends, so that the latter found life a very pleasant thing in the gay little cantonment where the regiment which Colonel Gore commanded was stationed.

In April Mrs. Gore and Maud betook themselves to Naini Tal.

Colonel Gore came up in July, and his wife and Maud rode down as far as the Brewery to meet him. They arrived early at the meeting place, and walking on through the gorge, settled themselves near a bowlder covered with waving ferns, over which the water dripped, from whence they could see a bit of the road up which Colonel Gore must pass. Mrs. Gore was the first to catch sight of the traveller for whom they waited.

"Oh, Maud!" she cried, "what a bother! He is not alone. How like Ben to pick up some one, when he might know that I am dying to tell him everything as we ride up."

Mrs. Gore's astonishment knew no bounds when she found that the stranger was Major Merton, but Maud was silent until he asked her point-blank whether she had recognized him on the road, and then she answered very quietly:

"I thought it looked like you."

Mrs. Gore chattered away to Ben all the way home, but the pair behind was rather silent. Major Merton's recollections of Maud were very hazy, but he had imagined her to be a young woman of decided opinions, and one whose voice was heard more frequently than Constance's in the Norfolk Rectory, and he glanced at her from time to time, wondering at the change, little thinking that she was still oppressed by the thought of his sufferings, which, truth to tell, he had almost forgotten, having soon realized that he was just as happy without the bride who had so coolly deserted him.

As they passed through the bazaar and saw the first shimmer of the waters of the lake and faced the circle of the hills which surround it, he turned and asked her the inevitable question:

"How do you like Naini?"

And she, looking up at him for the first time, showed her dark eyes positively radiant with some hidden light and answered as though to a question in the Catechism—solemnly and earnestly:

"I think it is the most beautiful place in the whole world, Major Merton."

That night Mrs. Gore was silent for five whole minutes when alone with Ben, and then broke into such an infectious peal of laughter that he joined in it begging to know what it was all about.

"Oh," said she, "it struck me as being so funny! I believe we brought out Major Merton's bride, after all."

"What on earth do you mean?" said Colonel Gore.

"Why, Maud is such a sentimental child that I fancy the idea of Major Merton's broken heart, which, of course, was all nonsense, made her more than half in love with him herself, while, as for Major Merton, you know if a man wants to get married he will not give it up because one girl refuses him; he will go on till he finds one who will wed, so there will be no difficulty about him——"

"My dear child, stop! You have absolutely nothing to go upon, and I cannot have you matchmaking for Maud."

"I am not matchmaking!" (indignantly.) "I would not do anything so horrid. But you see how delightful it would be, and you know the regiment is in orders for Lucknow, and Major Merton's battery is at Cawnpore, so I should be able to see a lot of Maud when she was married, and——"

"You had much better go to bed. Merton is not likely to contemplate marriage for a long time after such a nasty hit."

"How little you know about men!" sighed the sage of twenty-four, and Colonel Gore subsided into silence with a chuckle of delight.

Mrs. Gore behaved very well. Even Ben, who kept a sharp lookout upon her, admitted that. She was friendly with Major Merton, certainly, but not ostentatiously so. She invited him to dinner about once a week, and to every picnic that she gave; but so she did Charlie Manners, the young R. A. who was Maud's friend, and whose devotion was so open that she could hardly help laughing over it to Major Merton in private.

And Maud, much older for her seven months' Indian experience, gave up pitying Major Merton, put the thought of Constance's misdeed away, and enjoyed the happiest weeks of her whole life, in that delightful state of mind, known once and once only, when a girl forgets the past and the future and feels that the present is very good.

Sept. 13.

"Maud—I go down to-morrow, and though I tried to speak to you last night I never had the opportunity, for when I had I was too miserably uncertain of what your answer would be to dare to risk all upon a question. But now I cannot leave you without getting one word of hope. You know—I need not tell you that—that I love you. You must have seen, ever since the day you met me half way down the hill, that you are dearer to me than any one else in the whole world; that I am content just to be with you; no, that is not true, for I want you for my own, all your dear self. Can you do it? How can I ask it, and whatever it may be you will know that I am yours and yours only."

Tuesday morning.

"One word will not do. Yes—and—Yes—and Yes—and that means I love you, and that means everything! Do you know that I am so glad you wrote? Can you guess why? Well, I read your letter to Constance, and I wanted to know whether you could write differently, and I see that you can! I shall see you to-night, and I will not think of to-morrow's goodby.

"MAUD."

No Two Men Alike.

The professor who would aim at shaping the character of all his students according to one uniform ideal standard would be attempting the impossible, because he would be striving to do what is at variance with the laws of nature and of nature's God. In all the Creator's works there is charming variety. There are no two stars in the firmament equal in magnitude and splendor, "for star differeth from star in glory"; there are no two leaves of the forest alike, no two grains of sand no two human faces. Neither can there be two men absolutely identical in mental capacity or moral disposition. One may excel in solid judgment, another in tenacity of memory and a third in brilliancy of imagination. One is naturally grave and solemn, another is gay and vivacious. One is of a phlegmatic, another of a sanguine temperament. One is constitutionally shy, timid and reserved, another is bold and demonstrative. One is taciturn, another has his heart in his mouth. The teacher should take his pupils as God made them, and aid them in bringing out the hidden powers of their soul. If he tries to adopt the levelling process by casting all in the same mould, his pupils will become forced and unnatural in their movements; they will lose heart, their spirit will be broken, their manhood crippled and impaired.—North American Review.

An Unfailing Sign of Longevity.

Starting from the base of the big toe there is a distinct line. That is the life line. In one foot it will curve along until it terminates under the instep far toward the lower base of the little toe. This means long life. If broken in the hollow of the foot it denotes a sickness at middle age, and if it terminates in the hollow of the foot it means a short life. This line is the most interesting one on the foot. The experiments that have been conducted lately have proven this to be an almost unfailing reading of longevity.

What is known as the Carver claim to the site of the city of St. Paul and part of Minneapolis is to be revived. Congress refused to recognise the claim in 1848, and in 1861 the original documents, purporting to cede the land from the Indians to Captain Jonathan Carver, were destroyed when the State Capitol was burned.

COMPLETELY PROSTRATED

The Sad Condition of One of Indiana's Fair Young Ladies.

From the News, Indianapolis, Ind.

Probably one of the most direct, as well as extraordinary, cases where Dr. Williams' Pink Pills was the immediate cause of effecting a permanent cure of complete nervous prostration, is that of Miss Pearl Hosier, who lives in the country with her grandmother, Mrs. Michael Crull, ten miles west of Richmond, Ind.

Hearing of the case a reporter visited this young lady a short time ago and learned the following facts:

Miss Pearl is now in her nineteenth year. Up to the time that she was 15 she was well, stout and very hearty. As she developed into womanhood a slight twitching of the nerves and muscles of the hands, arms and face were noticed, and rapidly became worse from day to day, and a disposition was shown to avoid all company, and she became melancholy.

The best medical advice was obtained and she was treated by two physicians, both of whom failed in giving her any relief.

It was while the disease was at its worst that her father came across a notice in one of the papers of the curative powers of the Pink Pills for Pale People, and he at once procured a box for his daughter and had her brought home. The results were almost immediately effectual to the great joy of Miss Hosier's friends and relatives and the astonishment of everybody, all of whom are happy in testifying to the same.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to female, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. They build up the blood, and restore the glow of health to pale and sallow cheeks. In men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature. Pink Pills are sold in boxes (never in loose bulk) at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

Apples Good for Dyspepsia.

Where all did so very well, it is not easy to discriminate, and all deserve high praise. The improvement made in a short time by some of the little ones was a surprise. The older ones, are reaching out for perfection, evidently in fact it was a real musical treat. Miss Maxson has besides a highly cultivated musical taste, rare executive ability to have the details so well arranged previously there were no directions to be given, no running back and forth, and no break from first to last, in a class of over thirty. The program was a fine one.

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg. Pa., and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER.—tf

FOR STAMP COLLECTORS.

From Harper's Round Table.

Collectors in the West are warned against an old-time philatelist who is going about offering "specimens" of the U. S. Stamps at very low prices. Several of these sets have been sent for examination, and they prove to be card-board proofs rubbed down with pumicestone, gummed, and perforated. The word "specimen," instead of being printed, was then applied, by means of a rubber-stamp, in aniline ink. These are very dangerous frauds, as few young collectors are familiar with the genuine always saleable in New York city at fair prices. When any one offers these stamps at "bargain-counter" rates, it is safe to say that there is something wrong in the transaction.

The Nova Scotia "find" made a very little flurry in this country, but in England it has developed into a first-class sensation. The leading dealers are involved, and letters to one another and to the philatelic press abound; but, curious to say, no definite information is given. The facts seem to be that one large dealer was offered sets at sixty-two cents and several weeks later another large dealer advertised himself as the sole agent for the sale of these stamps, and fixed six dollars as he price of the set. In the absence of any statement as to the true quantity of each of the stamps, collectors refuse to buy except at very low prices.

Harrison Day.

A LARGE CROWD GREETED THE EX-PRESIDENT HERE THIS MORNING

The Town Beautifully Decorated With Flags And Bunting

Saturday's Daily.

Following the liberal example not acted by republicans when Gov. Matthews was here. Many democrats decorated their homes and business places, in honor of Benjamin Harrison, not only as an ex-president of the United States, but as an Indiana citizen, the only president our state has furnished It does not matter that he comes on a political errand. This is his right as a citizen. It was Gov. Matthews' right as a citizen and we are glad all parties did him honor. We shall not vote as he does for he is against the people and the people's interests.

The time for his arrival from the south was set at about 9 a. m. and at an early hour people began to come into town and the streets assumed a lively appearance. There were bands and a large number of people of both sexes and all ages. A big delegation came in from Garrett and carried banners for "sound money." As cheers for Bryan greeted them, one of the poor marchers called out to a Bryan shouter "Have you got a job?" as much as to say that was what he was marching for. The stand for the speaker was put up on the sidewalk in front of Schaab Brothers' furniture store and the crowd was kept near there by means of a band and singers, until Harrison's train arrived at the Lake Shore depot. Then he was quietly brought up street only one other carriage being in line with the bus, that was bringing up passengers. The carriage was stopped at the alley that runs back of the Hollister House and here he was taken through and into the rear of the Schaab building and through that to the front, where speaking began at once as soon as the cheers ended. At once he ceased to be the honored ex-chief magistrate of the whole people and became as he has so often before, the little political demagogue of the hour. His speech was down to the lowest level. He told them again the old exploded story that the silver dollar would be only 50 cents and would not have the guarantee of the government. But any child knows that only the government can coin money from any metal and as the government coins it has always the guarantee of the government, just as it has to-day. To-day it is only worth 50 cents, but the government takes it for 100. That law no one proposes to change and no one but a demagogue or an ignorant man will say there will be any different dollar from the one we have now, unless it will be a dollar whose bullion value will be greater, while the government guarantee is the same.

Condensed Testimony.

Chas. B. Hood, Brooker and Manufacturer's Agents, Columbus, Ohio, certifies that Dr. King's New Discovery has no equal as a Cough remedy. J. D. Brown, Prop. St. James Hotel, Fort Wayne, Ind., certifies that he was cured of a Cough of years standing, caused by LaGrippe, by Dr. King's New Discovery. B. F. Farrell, Baldwinville, Mass., says that he has used and recommended it and never knew it to fail and would rather have it than any doctor, because it cures. Mrs. Hemming, 222 E. 25th St., Chicago, always keeps it at hand and has no fear of Croup, because it instantly relieves. Free Trial Bottles at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store. 3

Bryan and Prosperity

Saturday a long train of cars loaded with Oliver plows from South Bend went through Butler. They were decorated with flags and mottoes, and big cards for "Bryan. Free silver and prosperity." The Olivers are free silver men, and say it will make times so much better that they can sell more plows. Every manufacturer should see that this is how it will be.

Mrs. Boullior, 222 Crane St, Writes:

Dayton, O., March 12, '96.—'My baby is two months old and from her birth has had severe attacks of wind colic. I tried almost everything, but nothing gave her any relief until I got Dr. Hand's Colic Cure. I have used two bottles and would not do without it. It surely is the best colic medicine ever made." Measuring Electricity

When electricity came to be sold, it was necessary to measure it commercially. To this task Edison set himself in the course of his development of that remarkable series of inventions which gave to the world a perfected lighting system. Electricity can be measured by the work it does, either chemically or mechanically. Edison's chemical meter depends on the simple fact that one ampere of electricity will deposit from sulphate of zinc under standard conditions a definite weight of metal. This type of meter is, in fact, a small electro-plating battery, through which a certain proportion of the current used is carried—the proportion being accurately determined by the relative size of the meter wires and the shunts—with the result that one of the two plates is decreased and the other increased in weight, according to the amount of current consumed within the house. This meter does not give a visible record, which is an advantage of the mechanical meters. Of these there are many varieties, those most in use in this country being the Thomson-Houston watt-meter and the Westinghouse or Schallenberg ampere-meter, both of which are small motors, driven faster or slower as the demand for current is greater or less, and communicating their action to a train of wheels with dials like those of the gasmeter, so that they may be verified by burning a given number of lamps for an hour and comparing the dials at the beginning and end of the time. The meter record is taken usually once a month, by the supply companies, and bills are based upon these records with as much certainty as though electricity were a visible thing. —From "Electricity," by R. R. Bowker, in Harper's Magazine for October.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on th farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could b used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. JOHN G. N. tf

He Knew Better

Harrison knew he was lying when he said under free coinage, a silver dollar would be private property and government would have nothing to do with its value. Gold has free coinage and the value of the gold dollar is that fixed by government It does not depend as Harrison claims on the holder of it, for its value. Under free coinage both metals will be treated alike. Take a certain amount of siver bars to the mint and the assayer will find how many silver dollars they will make counting 371¼ grains of fine silver for a dollar. Then there must be enough alloy to make the weight up to 412½ grains and this alloy, the man who brings the silver for sale or coinage, must pay for. After deducting this from the value of his silver, he is paid the value of the rest in money, say silver dollars. These are the same silver dollars we are using every day, each buying as much as a gold dollar or a paper dollar and each worth 100 cents as money, because the government says by law it will take them for debts due to it and pay them out to cash its own debts, as it is doing all along. Any man who denies this statement of a plain every day business transaction, shows his ignorance of business methods either public or private. Gen. Harrison cannot be accused of ignorance as can some of his thoughtless followers. He has made a willful misstatement, such as is often called by a less polite name.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

Nervous Prostration

Cured by Dr. Miles' Nervine.

Prolonged derangement of the nervous system not only affects the brain and mental powers, but develops disease in some of the vital organs. The most dangerous of these indirect results is when the heart is affected. This was the case of the Rev. N. F. Surface, Fawn River, Mich., who writes under date of Feb. 14, 1895:

"Fourteen years ago I had a slight stroke of paralysis. Overwork brought on nervous prostration. I was exceedingly nervous and the exertion of public speaking caused heart palpitation that threatened my life. I used two bottles of Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure for my heart trouble, and two of Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine for my nervousness and feel better than I ever expected to feel again. I can speak for hours without tiring or having my heart flutter as it formerly did, and I have you to thank that I am alive today."

A Statement.

Thursday's Daily.

This forenoon we received a message asking the editor of this paper to come to the office of the Kiblinger Carriage Company to meet a delegation of business men. On reaching there we found Charles Eckhart, Frank Eckhart, G. A. Bishop, Frank Zimmerman, W. H. McIntyre, S. C. Snyder, and Sam Hanna, men representing the three carriage factories and the Auburn Foundry & Machine Works. We found that they objected to what we said in yesterday's DAILY. "Now let the factories open up, and stop shipping off their goods in the night." Every man present asserted that not a single piece of work had been taken out of their factories in the night, and we give this statement on their word. The Kiblinger Co. say there had been some crating done in their establishment in the night, but it was by parties who have the job of doing that, and they are not responsible for it. Again, these men objected to another item, which said, "But of all cudgels to deprive a man of his political independence, the threat of 'no employment' seems to be the winner. We do not envy a man his feelings when he secures a job at so dear a price." This item way merely a general statement of a claim made not only in Auburn, but all over the country, and we were surprised to have them take it all home. However, all denied any attempt at coercing their men and we give the public that denial, also on their testimony. We have no personal knowledge as to either item. We gave it as it was generally told all over town and generally believed. There are still stories of this kind afloat, and the only way it can be stopped, as far as we see, is for these gentlemen to meet those who tell it and settle the matter between them. We have heard it stated over and over again that employes have been told that if McKinley were elected there would be work, but if it was Bryan there would not be. We are not responsible for these stories and do not pretend to be. Let those who know, on both sides, settle it. People have complained of other business men, that after buying goods, the proprietor wanted to argue politics, and that employes, were altogether too aggressive in that line. This also we know nothing of, and these parties must settle their own differences.

Free Pills.

Send your address to H. E. Bucklen & Co., Chicago, and get a free sample of Dr. King's New Life pills. A trial will convince you of their merits. These pills are easy in action and are particularly effective in the cure of consumption and sick headache. For Malaria and liver troubles they have been proved invaluable. They are guaranted to be perfectly free from every deleterious substance and to be purely vegetable. They do not weaken by their action, but by giving tone to stomach and bowels greatly invigorate the system. Regular size 25c per box. Sold at Robbins & McCord's drug store.

Burglars Visit St. Joe

(St. Joe News.)

After giving the town a long rest, burglars entered the store of Sol Barney sometime last Thursday night and made quite a haul They broke into the car house and took a pick and pried open the front door of Barney's store. As near as can be ascertained they took dress goods, underwear, shoes and other articles to the value of nearly a hundred dollars. No one heard the noise, and there is no clue as to who the guilty parties are.

Three Crops.

We have on our table, a small, but perfect apple brought to us by Mrs. Mahlon Boren, from their home a few miles east of town. She says this is of the second crop this season, and that a third set of blossoms have appeared on the tree but we presume owing to the lateness of the season did not produce apples. The first crop was an ordinary one of good fruit, the second, was generally of small ones like the one we have. We shall keep it here for those curious in such matters to look at. But surely we never heard of more than a second crop before, and then only of blossoms. These are real apples. Supt Merica in town also reports a second crop of the early Astrakhans, several of which were nearly full size, but were deficient in taste

Cheaper than Moving

As funny a thing as the late campaign developed was a case right here in Auburn. A man had got behind in his rent and the agent of the property wanted him to get out, so it could be rented to another man. This, the tenant agreed to do, till it occurred to him that he would lose his vote if he moved. In some way a candidate for office hearing of his case gave him to understand that he would pay his rent and enough ahead to let him stay till after election. This was satisfactory, and the man continued to stay there. But about this time the opposing candidate appeared on the scene and expressed himself as anxious to pay the rent, saying he did not want the man to move till after November 3, as the man was to vote for him. The agent said he did not care who paid the bill, but warned the man that this special vote had been pledged to his opponent and under exactly the same conditions. But candidate No. 2, said he felt certain of his man and, and his side finally paid in the money, the man did not move, but just who got his vote, we cannot say. It was simply one of those queer things that happen in a hot contest such as is often had in this county.

Obituary

Three times in four weeks has death entered the home of Charles J. Sheets and each time taken one of the little ones. Oct. 26 Baby Carl, aged 4 years, 13 days, fell a victim to that dread disease diptheria croup, The next day Millie aged 11 years, 4 month and 5 days was stricken with the the same disease. These children with the two that are yet living were members of the M. E. Sunday school Junior League and were recently baptized. The grief stricken parents have the sympathy of the entire church and community, and though many friends were shut off from acts of kindness that they would have loved to perform some could go to them. Rev. J. K. Waits held a very touching service for them and they were laid to rest in Woodlawn cemetery. We are glad to know in these sad trials that Jesus was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief and that He has said "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted."

After the Election.

The Democrats are Doing Some Sweet Soothing and Tittering

The gold side won.

Who will be deputy sheriff?

As near as we can tell the bottom fell out, nationally.

We don't see a very great deal to laugh about.

Remember,, "If at first you don't succeed, Try, try again."

Charles M. Brown got there with both feet.

And Doctor Nusbaum got there with both hands and feet.

It thawed a little in this county but it was an awful snow storm in some localities. It is a cold day when democrats get left.

We offer condolence to the prohibition party. They were beaten shamefully and we know how to sympathize with them.

There were too many Joneses in the national management and after this we are agin the Joneses. We favor giving the Smiths a chance.

The impression is quite general that business will revive a good deal now that the excitement of the election is over.

DeKalb county swims around like a big spider in the republican soup. It has spoilt the appetite of the republican saints and they refuse to howl at the banquet.

Sixteen to one may be out of date, but a sow down in St. Joe county does not think so. She gave birth to a litter of pigs which contained 16 white ones and one black one.

Speaking nationally and in its broad-an sense we are like the robin that is "saddest when it sings," but speaking locally we are dong some sweet and soothing twittering.

"And the rains descended and the floods come and the winds blew and beat upon the DeKalb county democratic house; and it fell not, for it was founded on a rock."

The election has settled the fact that DeKalb county is again reliably democratic. If the republicans cannot carry the county when the democrats were divided, as they have been, this year, they may as well, "hang up the fiddle" and quit.

Thief Arrested.

(Kendallvill Sun.)

Sunday evening Marshal Berhalter arrested a crook, who had in his possession a new horse blanket. He gave his name as Fish, and Chicago as his home. After he had been put under arrest, he told the marshal that he was implicated in a little matter which happened in this city a few days ago, and wanted to know that if he would "cough up," he would be sent to the pen. The marshal seeing that he was sick and not able to endure exposure, put him in the "sweat box," and he acknowledged to the robbery of Fisher's sample rooms a few day ago, together with a colored companion. He was given a hearing, and pleaded guilty to stealing ten dollars and was put under bond, and taken to Albion to jail. He says that he was a hard working, honest young man until the great Chicago strike, when that trouble got him out of work, and having no home or relatives, he resorted to petty thieving for a livelihood. He says his companion in crime is a dangerous man, and that the country if full of them.

—The subject for to-morrow morning at they Presbyterian church will be, 'Fulfilling the Past,' a national theme. Services at 7 o'clock in the evening, You are always welcome at these services.

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $8 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa, and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf for Infants and Children.

CASTORIA

MOTHERS, Do You Know that Paregoric, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, many so-called Soothing Syrups, and most remedies for children are composed of opium or morphine?

Do You Know that opium and morphine are stupefying narcotic poisons?

Do You Know that in most countries druggists are not permitted to sell narcotics without labeling them poisons?

Do You Know that you should not permit any medicine to be given your child unless you or your physician know of what it is composed?

Do You Know that Castoria is a purely vegetable preparation, and that a list of its ingredients is published with every bottle?

Do You Know that Castoria is the prescription of the famous Dr. Samuel Pitcher. That it has been in use for nearly thirty years, and that more Castoria is now sold than of all other remedies for children combined?

Do You Know that the Patent Office Department of the United States, and of other countries, have issued exclusive right to Dr. Pitcher and his assigns to use the word "Castoria" and its formula, and that to imitate them is a state prison offense?

Do You Know that one of the reasons for granting this government protection was because Castoria had been proven to be absolutely harmless!

Do You Know that 35 average doses of Castoria are furnished for 35 cents, or one cent a dose?

Do You Know that when possessed of this perfect preparation, your children may be kept well, and that you may have unbroken rest?

Well, these things are worth knowing. They are facts.

The fac-simile signature of Chas. H. Fletcher is on every wrapper.

THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

The Latest News as Flashed Over the Wires from All Parts of the World—Regarding Politics, Religion, Casualties, Commerce, and Industry.

CAPTAIN HATFIELD

And His 14-year-old Son Captured at Last.

A special from Huntington, W. Va., says: J. H. Clark, a famous detective and Deputy Sheriff of the Norfolk and Western, accompanied by Dan Christian, have arrived here with Capt. Hatfield and his 14-year-old son, who were captured in the mountains of Mingo County. They are charged with the murder of John Rutherford, Elliott Rutherford and Hanse Chambers on election day at Mattewan. Hatfield and son were interviewed at the jail and they seem not the least worried over the affair. The lad smiled and said: "I killed both Elliott Rutherford and Mr. Chambers," while the father acknowledged to killing John Rutherford.

Hatfield and son were asleep in the crevice of a large rock cliff on Tug River when officers discovered them. They were brought here and placed in jail for fear of mob violence.

Revolution in Business.

R. G. Dun & Co., in their Weekly Review of trade, says:

"A great revolution has been effected this week in the conditions which control business. It could not be in any fair degree reflected as yet in transactions or in records, but there is ample evidence already that a crushing weight has been lifted and rolled away and the business world has adjusted itself to a state of freedom and security which it has not known for years and new contracts involving many millions have become binding since the election."

Laying Siege to Havana.

According to insurgent statements the frequency of engagements recently in the Province of Havana, are evidence of the truth of the report that Antonio Maceo and Maximo Gomez are directing the forces under their command upon the city of Havana with the intention of laying siege to it. They still continue to insist that Maceo passed the military line after having bombarded Artimesa as a feint, and that important events are likely to happen shortly. As a matter of fact, the Spanish commanders admit that they are not aware of the whereabouts of Maceo.

Widow Mother Murdered.

Mrs. Louisa Nipple, a widow, and the mother of six children, was shot near Camden, Ind., Thursday evening, and died a few hours later. Mrs. Nipple was gathering corn in a neighbor's field, across the road from her house, when two men approached her, one armed with a gun. One shot her down. The shot attracted the attention of William Caldwell and Robert Lennon, who hurried to the scene and carried the dying woman to her house.

Cruisers for Japan to Be Built in American Yards.

Washington special: News has reached here that the Japanese Government has finally awarded to the American ship builders contracts for building two swift protected cruisers of the Olympia type. One goes to Cramp & Son of Philadelphia, and one to the Union Iron Works of San Francisco. The prices are not stated.

Mrs. Castle Guilty.

The trial of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Castle of San Francisco, charged with shoplifting, took place in the session house at Clerkenwell and resulted in Mr. Castle being acquitted and Mrs. Castle being sentenced to three months' imprisonment without hard labor. There was much interest taken in the case, especially among the members of the American colony.

Fell Dead.

Mrs. Mary V. Marvin, the wife of a prominent business man of Seattle, Wash., greeted her husband at the door as he returned home and eagerly inquired if Bryan was elected. Upon being informed that he was defeated, she fell to the floor and expired in a few minutes. It is supposed that she was stricken with heart disease.

The Hawaiian Government has granted a full pardon and restoration of her civil rights to ex-Queen Liliuokalani. The pardon is based upon the fact that during her parole she has faithfully kept the terms of her partial freedom.

Wrecked Safe and House.

The safe in the office of M. Thomson & Sons, poultry dealers of Lima, Ohio, was blown open by burglars and $60 in cash and several hundred dollars in notes taken. The tools were obtained from a neighboring blacksmith shop. The explosion was so strong that the safe was blown through one side of the building.

Thanksgiving Day.

President Cleveland has issued a proclamation designating Thursday, the 26th inst., as a day of Thanksgiving and praise.

Colored Burglar is Wounded.

While in the act of robbing the residence of Maj. A. P. Morey at Sedalia, Mo., Friday morning, James Henderson, colored, had over 200 birdshot fired into his face and breast by the Major. The wounded man attempted to flee, but was captured. He will recover.

Killed in a Street Car Panic.

At Newark, N. J., a trolley car was filled with Italian laborers, when a fuse of the electric car blew out, sending a puff of smoke into the car. The men rushed for the doors. Two were killed in the crush, and three others of the party sustained minor injuries.

DEATH OF GEN. TORRENCE.

One of Chicago's Prominent Citizens Succumbs to Bright's Disease.

Gen. Joseph T. Torrence died Saturday night at his home, 88 Bellevue place, Chicago. Although he had been confined to his bed for only two weeks, he had been suffering two years with Bright's disease. Gen. Torrence was born March 15, 1843, in Mercer County, Pennsylvania. Before he had reached his teens he set out in the world to make his own way. His first employment was in the blast furnaces of Pennsylvania. There he learned the blacksmith trade, and it was not long until he was promoted to the foremanship of the furnaces. Gen. Torrence remained with the blast furnaces until the breaking out of the civil war, when he enlisted as a private in Company A, One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Soon after his enlistment he became a noncommissioned officer. During his services in the army he was wounded seriously four times. After the war he went to Newcastle, in his native State, where he was re-engaged in the work of supervising furnaces. In 1869 Mr. Torrence came to Illinois and became connected with the Chicago Iron Company at Bridgeport. Five years later he was appointed colonel of the Second Regiment of the Illinois National Guard. In 1876 Gov. Shelby M. Cullom promoted him to brigadier general, just a short time before the riots of 1877. The authorities adopted measures placing Gen. Torrence in absolute command of the city during the riots.

PUBLIC DEBT SHOWS AN INCREASE

During October Uncle Sam's Liabilities Were Augmented $7,195,726.

The October statement of the public debt shows the debt, less cash in the treasury on Oct. 31, to have been $987,498,956, an increase for the month of $7,195,726, which is accounted for by a corresponding decrease in the cash on hand. The debt is recapitulated as follows:

Interest bearing debt	$847,364,460
Debt on which interest has ceased since maturity	1,607,010
Debt bearing no interest	372,100,247
Total	$1,221,071,717

This, however, does not include $564,340,923 in certificates and treasury notes outstanding which are offset by an equal amount of cash in the treasury. The cash in the treasury is classified as follows:

Gold	$155,323,825
Silver	509,058,741
Paper	154,654,286
Bonds, disbursing officers' balances, etc.	17,639,361
Total	$836,676,221

Against which there are demand liabilities amounting to $603,103,460, which leaves a cash balance of $233,572,761.

TUBERS WILL BE DEAR.

Potato Crop Has Fallen Off—Prices Will Be Restored.

The potato crop is in a bad way. The officers of the Agricultural Department do not consider this a calamity. The overabundant crop of last year made potatoes scarcely worth digging. The average price fell to 26 cents a bushel. It had never been so low since the war. More than 279,000,000 bushels were produced in the United States, not counting thousands of bushels left in the ground. The indications are that the total yield this year will not exceed 250,000,000 bushels. Even this could be the largest crop ever raised in this country, excepting the phenomenal crop of last year, when everybody planted potatoes. More or less complaint of rotting comes from nearly every section of the country, but particularly from the New England and Eastern States.

Farmers Advised to Hold Wheat.

The Mark Lane Express of London counsels farmers to hold their grain, and says: "The price of English may reach to 28s, but it should rise again in December. The new wheat crop of Argentina is now offered for spring shipment. It is now below 30s. This gives a glimpse of the future, as Argentine wheat should always be cheaper than English. Telegrams from India on Saturday give the rainfall in October as very small at all the chief stations. The best was in the Punjab, and it was practically nil on the east coast. Wheat, accordingly, has risen to 30s a quarter at Calcutta, and there is considerable distress among the poor." The viceroy of India, the Earl of Elgin, cabled the home government that in the Punjab the distress is expected merely in Gissutley portion and in Transkari. In tracts of Lahore, Giyranwalla, Gujerat and Shapur the autumn crops are rather better and in the northwest provinces the affected area is smaller than expected, but includes half the population. The people are now eating autumn millets. The distress will begin about the middle of December. The revenue-paying rice crops have largely failed, and about a third of the autumn taxation will be suspended; money will be advanced for seeds and temporary wells, and excellent effect is expected from these relief messengers. In spite of this, however, the viceroy admits that distress is feared. The general prospects in Bengal are gloomy. If there is no rain in November the distress may be serious. Relief work has been opened in three districts of the upper Burmah, and relief is likely to be wanted everywhere in Berar. Distress is also expected in Hyderabad, Bhurtpur, Dholpur, Jaisalmere, Bikanir, Tonk, Gwalior and parts of Bagkelkhand and Bundelkand. Several thousand tons of California wheat have reached Calcutta, and 30,000 tons are believed to have been bought for India, but the home prices are said to be rising.

Public Receipts and Expenses.

The monthly comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States shows the total receipts for the month of October to have been $25,282,829, as compared with $27,901,748 for October, 1895. The disbursements during the month aggregate $38,978,277, showing a deficit for October of $7,655,458, as compared with the deficit of $6,601,687 for October last year. The receipts for the month are classified as follows:

Customs	$11,105,493
Internal revenue	13,363,156
Miscellaneous	1,814,180

As compared with October, 1895, the customs decreased about $2,688,000, and the internal revenue increased about $150,000. The total deficit since July 1, 1896, is $32,889,577.

Four Laborers Slain.

While Jeff Jackson, John Adams, William Taylor and Robert Allison, negro laborers, were working at a sugar cane mill near Wild Fork, Monroe County, Alabama, they were fired upon from the darkness by unknown persons. All but Taylor were instantly killed. He will die. It is supposed to have been done by a gang of white caps, who have been engaged in running all negroes out of that section.

Stabbing Results in Death.

Thomas Ryan died in Newport from the result of a stab received Tuesday night, as he was stepping out of a saloon. Patrick Caulfield has been arrested at Cincinnati charged with the murder.

Cash for Sailors.

Judge H. C. Hanford, at Seattle, Wash., has handed down his decision in the famous salvage case of the Canadian-Australian Steamship Line, owner of the Miowera, and the Pacific Improvement Line, owner of the steamship Minola versus the steamship Strathnevis, in which he decreed to the former company $26,200 and the latter $20,500 for their efforts in saving the Strathnevis, which foundered in the Pacific Ocean several hundred miles off Cape Flattery in the terrific storm that prevailed in December, 1895. The opinion is an exhaustive one, and fully covers the case, giving a graphic description of the efforts of the two steamers to tow the Strathnevis to a place of safety. The court complimented the crew of the Minola on their efforts, and decreeing the $20,500, remembered every member of the crew in amounts varying from $1,800 to Captain Pittsbury, to $50 to the cabin boy. The owners of the vessel get $12,000. In the case of the Miowera, the court gave to the owners $18,000, and to every member of the crew from captain down, amounts ranging from $500 to $50.

COAL FIELD FOUND IN ONTARIO.

Rich Deposit in the District of Algoma to Be Opened.

Four months ago there was a discovery of coal in Algoma, western Ontario. The Lehigh Valley Railroad dispatched experts to the scene of the discovery with instructions to test the coal thoroughly, and if it was, in their opinion, of the quality represented to at once buy up the surrounding country and secure an option on the district. But when the Lehigh Valley people had made up their minds to buy it they found Canadian capitalists had got in before them and had a claim on the property. The Lehigh Valley combine has not given up hope of securing the coal mines. A proposition is now before the syndicate in which the combine offers to pay more than $1,000,000 if the present holders of the options will sell out to them the whole district which the syndicate has now secured. The advisability of accepting the offer is being considered. The syndicate would prefer to start a Canadian company with $1,000,000 capital stock. William Wilson, of Toronto, a representative of the Canadian syndicate, has gone to New York to meet capitalists there who may offer more for the property than the Lehigh Valley.

KILLED BY A MINE EXPLOSION.

Two Dead and Four Injured in a Pennsylvania Colliery Disaster.

Two persons were instantly killed and four others badly injured Monday afternoon by an explosion in Packer No. 2 colliery, at Ashland, Pa. The dead: Joseph Fann, aged 42; John Holleran, aged 36; the injured: John Korler, Nicholas Mack, John McGraw, Thomas Walsh, will probably die. The men were engaged in driving a tunnel and had bored a hole in the rock, which they charged with powder. The fuse was attached and lighted by Walsh, while the others ran to a place of safety. After lighting the fuse Walsh started after his comrades, but his clothing caught on a spike and held him fast. He cried for assistance and the men promptly responded. They had scarcely reached the spot before the explosion occurred.

Tells Who Killed Pearl Bryan.

Signs are pointing to a confession by Jackson and Walling, now in prison at Covington, Ky., or, at least, to a getting at the truth of the murder of Pearl Bryan. For two weeks Jackson and Walling have been kept in separate cells and a bitterness is growing up between them. Saturday Walling said to Turnkey Maurer: "Why should I be punished for a crime I did not commit? I did not murder Pearl Bryan. Jackson is the man who cut her head off." Maurer asked why he had not so testified, but Walling declined to answer.

Attempts to Kill Her Husband.

Mrs. Mary E. Marvin, of Findlay, Ohio, made an unsuccessful attempt to kill her husband, Willis Marvin. Several months ago Mr. Marvin began proceedings for divorce from his wife. Judge Schaufelberger, without being aware of the attempt to kill, granted Mr. Marvin's petition for divorce and gave Mrs. Marvin $2,600 alimony.

A NATION'S THANKS.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND NAMES DATE OF THE FESTIVAL.

Proclamation Appoints Thursday, Nov. 26, as the Day for Acknowledgment to the God of Nations for Blessings Vouchsafed the United States.

Homage to the Universal Ruler.

The President Wednesday issued the following thanksgiving proclamation:

"By the President of the United States: The people of the United States should never be unmindful of the gratitude they owe the God of nations, for his watchful care which has shielded them from disaster and pointed out to them the way of peace and happiness. Nor should they ever refuse to acknowledge with contrite hearts their proneness to turn away from God's teachings and to follow with sinful pride after their own devices.

"To the end that these thoughts may be quickened, it is fitting that on a day especially appointed we should join together in approaching the throne of grace with praise and supplication.

"Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of the present month of November, to be kept and observed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer throughout our land.

"On that day let all our people forego their usual work and occupation and, assembled in their accustomed places of worship, let them with one accord render thanks to the Ruler of the Universe for our preservation as a nation and our deliverance from every threatened danger; for the peace that has dwelt within our boundaries; for our defense against disease and pestilence during the year that has passed; for the plenteous rewards that have followed the labors of our husbandmen; and for all the other blessings that have been vouchsafed to us.

"And let us, through the mediation of him who has taught us how to pray, implore the forgiveness of our sins and a continuation of heavenly favor.

"Let us not forget on this day of thanksgiving the poor and needy, and by deeds of charity let out offerings of praise be made more acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

"Witness my hand and the seal of the United States, which I have caused to be hereto affixed.

"Done at the City of Washington this 4th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and twenty-first.

"GROVER CLEVELAND.

"By the President.

"RICHARD OLNEY,
"Secretary of State."

RAILROAD INTERESTS.

Prospects of Great Increase of General Traffic.

Chicago railroad officials say that for months their business has been exceedingly dull and earnings have been below the dull months of the last dull year. Now a revival is looked for in freight circles. Officials predict one of the heaviest movements of merchandise known in many years. Country merchants as well as the jobbers in the large cities have allowed their stocks to run down to the minimum. The movement of west-bound merchandise has been the lightest for many years. Thousands of stocks must be replenished and country merchants will buy heavily. This means heavy loads for the railroads, and correspondingly heavy earnings. No falling off in the heavy east-bound movement of grain, which began under the cut freight rates of last month, is looked for. Orders for cars are coming into general freight offices from all points in the west, and more than one road fears a car famine. As most of this grain will move under contracts made at the reduced rates there will not be large increases in revenue from that class of freight, but the greatest economy of operation as well as the greatest amount of revenue will develop from the movement of loaded cars both ways. Passenger men are also expecting heavy business. Commercial travelers make up a large percentage of all roads' passengers. Many merchants prefer buying their goods at the large centers to ordering of traveling men, and they, too, will soon be using passenger trains. The winter tourist business also has been delayed.

FORTUNES IN WHEAT.

Men Who Have Made Money Out of the Recent Rise.

Fortunes have been made by men who were on the right side of the market in the recent upward jump of wheat. Following are some of the Chicagoans who have added to their bank accounts and the amounts they have garnered: John Cudahy, $400,000; W. R. Linn, $300,000; W. T. Baker, $150,000; F. P. Frazier, $75,000; F. K. Dunn, $75,000; George T. Smith, $75,000; Arthur Orr, $50,000; C. L. Raymond, $50,000; J. A. Patten, $50,000; M. C. Mitchell, $50,000; John Dupee, $50,000; J. F. Rumsey, $50,000; T. M. Baxter, $50,000; W. C. Comstock, $40,000; John Barrett, $30,000; C. W. Brega, $25,000; C. A. Mair, $25,000; C. J. Singer, $25,000; John Dwight, $25,000; August Brosseau, $25,000; Harry Champlin, $25,000; J. A. Rankin, $20,000; R. Pringle, $20,000; John Scott, $20,000.

In addition to these there are many smaller winners and a host of commission firms and scalpers who have been able to keep the amount of their winnings from becoming known. St. Louis also shows some big winnings. At the head of the list stand W. T. Haarstick and W. D. Orthwein, with $100,000 each to their credit. Ben Boones made $75,000, C. H. Spencer $60,000, E. B. White and John Milliken $40,000 each. David R. Francis, Hoke Smith's successor as Secretary of the Interior in Cleveland's Cabinet, also made a big haul. Outside of Chicago and St. Louis, the biggest winner is C. A. Pillsbury, the Minneapolis miller, who cleared over $100,000.

No Second-Class Fares.

Lines members of the Central Passenger and Trunk Lines' committees are considering a proposition to abolish second-class fares. Another matter of more than ordinary interest to a large number of people concerns the policy to be followed next year in handling clergy business. It is said many of the passenger men are more than pleased with the manner in which Western roads handled the clergy business this year and that a like plan may be adopted by the Eastern lines. That, however, is hardly likely. The misuse of charity fares, protective forms of excursion tickets, government transportation orders, interterritorial party fares and a number of other interesting subjects are docketed for consideration.

Telegraphic Brevities.

Samuel H. Crow, of Lyons, Iowa, is dead at the age of 74 years.

Edna Farson, 5 years old, fell in New York and her teeth cut her tongue almost in two. She bled to death.

Miss Laura Bendolan committed suicide at Fremont, Neb. A love affair is thought to have caused the act.

AT FRENCH RESTAURANTS.

Waiters Find Easy Victims Among Travelers from the United States.

The restaurant life of Paris is as distinctive and idiosyncratic as the club life of London. The two modes of living are totally different, however, and mark elementary divergencies of national character and temperament. The Frenchman is a gourmet; the Englishman is a gourmand. The Frenchman likes the open air; the Englishman likes open air, too, but he wants his open air to be latticed in and girt about against intrusion. That which delights the Frenchman—the glitter, the chatter, the radiant and noisy ebb and flow of the boulevards—offends the Englishman.

Yet the better restaurants of Paris do not get their profits off their French patrons. It is the American who is relied on to bring up the average and to convert a loss into a gain, and for the Americans, therefore, the trap is set and the triggers are adjusted. He may swear and squirm and amuse the onlookers by his futile attempts in very crooked French to make his meaning plain, but to no avail. He will have to pay the bill. The swell restaurants have discovered a device for taking the luckless American completely captive, which deserves the name of great.

Like everything great, it is simple. No price is affixed to the several dishes upon the bill of fare. Thus the stranger is left entirely in the dark. He is at the mercy of the lady accountant and the head waiter. There is no fixed standard of value. There is no check upon enterprising rapacity. You order your dinner blindfold, and when "la note" is brought you have no recourse. The garcon shrugs his shoulders. The other garcons stand around and grin. The maitre de cusine is dignity a little tempered by majesty. You know that you are being swindled. You know that monsieur yonder, who had more dishes than you, and better served, has been charged from 10 to 100 per cent. less. But what can you do? You can do nothing. You can simply disgorge. If you ask the price in advance you commit a dreadful solecism. What does milor care about prices? Prices are made for the canaille. If milor wants cheap dinner he go to Duval. The Cafe Voison exists for gentlemen, not for persons who need to economize. The Cafe Anglaise does not desire cheap custom. It prides itself on being "tres cher." The poor American does not see it at all, but yet his vanity being touched, as well as his pocket, he goes away with an abridgment of the basso in his grumble. He is a wiser but a poorer man.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Liberal Education.

That man, I think, has had a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that, as a mechanism, it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear, cold logic engine, with all its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready, like a steam engine, to be turned to every kind of work and spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature, and of the laws of her operations; one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art, to hate all vileness, and to respect others as himself. Such a one, and no other, I conceive, has had a liberal education, for he is as completely as a man can be in harmony with nature. He will make the best of her, and she of him. They will get on together rarely; she as his ever beneficent mother, he as her mouthpiece, her conscious self, her minister and interpreter.—London Echo.

What Animals Shy At.

Young horses can be led up to a sack lying on the ground and induced to pass it by letting them smell it and find out that it really is a sack and not the Protean thing, whatever it may be, which illusion conjures up for them. Once the writer saw a very quick and pretty instance of experiment by touch made by a frightened pony. It was being driven as leader in a pony tandem and stopped short in front of where the rails of a steam tramway crossed the road. It first smelled the near rail and then quickly gave it two taps with its hoof. After this it was satisfied and crossed the line. On the other hand, a donkey always tried to jump the shadows of tree trunks in the road, though a similar experiment of touch would have shown that these were as unreal as the tram rail was substantial. Lastly, no horse which has once knocked its head against the top of a stable doorway seems quite able to get rid of the illusion that there sits up in the top of all doorways an invisible something which will hit him again next time he goes through; hence the troublesome and sometimes incurable habit of horses "jibbing" when taken out of the stable.—London Spectator.

A Bird that Shaves Itself.

The lammergeyer, or bearded vulture, found throughout the whole mountain chains of the old world, actually shaves himself. The expert barber, who has for his customers crusty millionaires, could not ply the keen-edged razor to the stubby beard of his particular patron more deftly than the monarch of the mountain tops prunes his own bristly beard.

The head of the vulture is clothed with feathers, and from the sides of the under mandible proceeds a row of black bristles. From this peculiar projection of feathers the bird derives his name. A layer of similar bristles begins at the eye and covers the nostrils, forming a fleecy mustache.

With his strong and sharp claws, which act as the razor, he begins to trim his fibrous whiskers with great care and dexterity. He does this with great regularity and soon the downy beard and mustache give way to a full growth of bristly feathers.—San Francisco Examiner.

Systems of Shorthand.

Between the system of Willis in 1602 and Pitman, 1837, there were 201 systems of shorthand published, and since that date there have been 281, making a total of 482.

Joseph McKelvey, principal of the Gosport schools, is lying in a farm house near that town, with a fractured skull, the result of coasting down a hill on his bicycle.

Harvey Johnson, an Owen County farmer, died from the effects of a blow upon the head, struck by his stepson in defense of his mother, whom Johnson was about to strike.

Felix D. Badger, a prominent citizen of Spencer, while driving to his farm was run over and killed by a four-horse team that had become frightened and was running away.

Albert Depew, a B. & O. freight conductor, living at Garrett, while attempting to board a passing freight fell under the train. Three other trains passed over him during the night.

John Maley's horse ran away at Liberty, and, as it came to the railroad track, a train dashed into it, cutting it to pieces. Maley was hurled down a hillside and picked up unconscious. When he came to, he thought he had been assaulted by highwaymen. He may recover.

A man giving his name as A. J. Johnson went to Columbus and purchased two farms of Owens & Williams, real estate agents, amounting to $4,300. He drew on the McClelland bank at Auburn, Ind., for $800 and obtained $15 at the bank in Columbus. It now turns out that he had no money in the bank at Auburn and he is now under arrest.

In the little town of Carbon, north of Brazil, fire broke out in the general store of W. R. Risher & Co., destroying the building and its contents. Loss, about $12,000. The flames spread to the opera house block, owned by James Kerr, which was destroyed, with the bulk of its contents. In this building was the general store of the Eureka Coal Company, Peter Cumming's saloon and Sinea Woods's furniture store. The loss is estimated at $75,000, partly covered by insurance.

Shelburn coal miners refuse to accept the scale of prices offered by the company, which is said to be 2 cents below the Star City prices. The company has posted the following notice: "The company has decided to begin work Nov. 5 at the following prices: Loaders and shooters, 29 cents per ton for clean coal; machine runners and slack shovelers, 11 cents per ton; day labor, same as before; reduction on house rent, 10 per cent.

Harry Wells, aged 20, got into a quarrel with a gang on the streets of Paoli, and an old soldier, Wm. L. Johnson, interfered. Wells became enraged and hit Johnson with a pair of knucks, knocking him down. The blow resulted fatally. Young Wells went home after the deed, and when Johnston died the Sheriff started out to capture him, but in the meantime he had fled and is still at large. Wells is the son of H. E. Wells, a rich man and at one time owner of the French Lick Springs.

Antioch church in Barr Township, Daviess County, was broken into and pillaged recently. The supply of wine used for the sacrament was drunk and the communion service was carried away. The members are up in arms, but so far have found nobody guilty.

George W. Staytes, a veteran railroad watchman, was found dead in bed at his home in Muncie the other day. He was 65 years old and was probably as well known as any other man in Muncie. He has been in the employ of the Big Four since the construction of the Bee-line. During all this time he has been flagman at various street-crossings—forty years.

Mrs. Bob Houser was found dead in her bed at Marion. She told a friend that she didn't care to live longer, then went to a drug store to buy morphine. Last winter she eloped with John West, a negro. She left no word for her husband who refused to live with her after the elopement.

In giving a dose of medicine to her 2-year-old child, Mrs. E. J. Lee of Gas City, caused its death almost instantly by strangulation. The child had sore throat, and the mother blew some alum and copperas into it. The stuff got into the bronchial tubes and brought on the choking. The mother is heart-broken over the affair and is being watched closely, in the fear that she will lose her mind.

CHAPTER VI.

Meanwhile two unusual things had taken place in Chetwynd street. John Hanbury, twenty-six years of age, of independent fortune, had entered it with Dora Ashton, aged twenty, to whom he was privately engaged to be married. Dora had never seen any of the poorer parts of Chicago, and he, after much expostulation and objection, consented to escort her through Chetwynd street.

At the eastern end, William Sampson, negro and street entertainer, had entered the street, prepared to perform, hoping to win a few coppers from the loungers. He was a tall man with round shoulders and restless eyes, was gesticulating violently and addressing loud speech, apparently to the first-floor windows of the houses opposite him in Chetwynd street.

The negro turned his face toward John Hanbury and Dora Ashton. He had beside him, on the ground, two cubes of stone, one the size of an iron half-hundredweight, the other somewhat bigger. In his hand he held a small, square, thin board.

"Yes, ladies and gentlemen," said he, "like a great opera singer, I earn the bread I put into my mouth with the mouth I put it into. Here is my stock in trade," patting his chin and cheek and jaw. He made a hideous grimace, at which there was a laugh mingled with a cheer.

This laugh brought Mr. Williams to his door, and finally into the street. He glanced at the negro and the crowd with benignant toleration, then, turning his eyes upward, he saw Leigh at the window, whither he had been attracted by the noise of the crowd. The window was open, and Leigh was leaning out and watching the group below.

Williams called out to the hunchback. "Come down, Mr. Leigh, and see the fun. A man who could afford to give good American money for a dead Egyptian prince would surely be interested in a living African black, whom he could see for nothing."

Leigh hesitated for a moment, then called out, "All right," and disappeared from the window.

Meanwhile the athlete was continuing his harangue.

"I carry them stones there about with me to prove to any man, who won't take my word for it, that I am the strongest jawed man in all the world. Ladies and gentlemen, you have often heard of the Rocky Mountains—there," pointing to the stones, "there they are."

"What will he do with the stones, Jack?" whispered Dora, with some apprehension of danger.

"Eat them," answered Hanbury in a whisper.

At this point Oscar Leigh opened the side door of Forbes' bakery and stepped into the street. John Hanbury, with Dora Ashton on his arm, was standing at the curb. About fifty people, men, women and children, were now gathered. Leigh took up his place by the landlord, without a word, and stood leaning heavily on his stick. He fixed his quick, piercing eyes on the negro.

The latter first took up the smaller block, tossed it high into the air, and let it fall on the road, saying, in a defiant voice, "Eighteen pounds." Then he took the larger block, and treating it in the same way, said "Twenty-four pounds. The two together forty-two pounds!"

Then Black Sam began a series of tricks with the stones. Before starting, he placed on the ground a square piece of white thin board. Then he balanced a stone on the point of the first finger of each hand, and then jerked the lesser stone from the point of his left forefinger to the top of the larger stone, still balanced on the forefinger of his right hand, and kept both upright on the point of his right forefinger for half a minute.

The negro stooped carefully, seized the larger stone, threw it a few feet into the air, and caught and balanced it on the top of the smaller one resting on his shoulder.

Something more wonderful than the contortions of Black Sam at that moment attracted Leigh's attention. He had caught sight of Dora Ashton, and Leigh's eyes were fixed on the slender form and pale olive face of the girl with an expression of amazement. He looked like an animal that suddenly sees something it dreads and from which it desires to remain concealed. He seemed stupefied, stunned, dazed. All the scorn had gone out of his face. He leaned forward more heavily than formerly on his crooked stick. He appeared to doubt the evidence of his senses.

Black Sam lifted his body a couple of inches, resting his entire weight on his feet; then, passing his hands back, he slid them under the lower cube and raised both hands from the ground, the lower cube resting on the palms. With back bent like a bow, he thrust out his head, holding the piece of board in his mouth parallel to the horizon; then he swung his body, first forward, then backward, and with a prodigious effort and violent thrust of his arms and head between his legs, threw the two cubes up into the air, straightened himself like a flash, stepped back a pace, and, still holding the piece of white board in his enormous mouth parallel to the horizon, caught the two cubes on it as they fell.

There was a loud cry of exultation. Hanbury forgot the girl by his side, forgot everything but the black man and his feat.

"What is he doing now?" asked Dora. "I cannot make out. What does he mean by throwing himself down in that way and lying still? Is he ill? Is he hurt? Go, see, help him, Jack. Look under his face on the ground! That is blood!"

John Hanbury did not move. He, too, had seen something was wrong. He, too, saw the swelling pool of bright scarlet blood under the black face of the negro now lying at full length. Still he did not move. He had grown deadly pale and cold and limp.

"I can't go, Dora. I am not well. I always faint at the sight of blood," and he staggered back, dragging her with him until he leaned against the blank wall of Forbes' bakery. His legs suddenly bent under him, and he slipped from her grasp.

At that moment Oscar Leigh stepped back from his post on the curb, and uncovered his head, bowed lowly to Dora, and said: "I beg your pardon. Will you allow me to assist you?"

In her haste, confusion, anxiety, Dora glanced but casually at the speaker, saying: "It is not I who want assistance, but he."

"I would assist even my rival for your sake," he said humbly, bowing low and remaining bent before her. "I did not hope to meet you again so soon. I did not think it would be my good luck to meet you once more to-day until I called at Grimsby street, Miss Grace."

The girl looked at Hanbury's recumbent form with anxiety and dread, and then in dire perplexity at the hunchback who had just raised his uncovered head:

"You are mistaken," she said. "I never saw you before. My name is not Grace. My name is Ashton, and this is Mr. John Hanbury. Oh! will no one help me?"

Leigh seized Hanbury and drew him away from the wall. "The best thing we can do is to lay him flat. So! Pray, forgive and forget what I said, Miss Ashton. I was sure you were Miss Grace, a lady I know, whom I met yesterday and this morning. Such a likeness never was before, but I can see a little difference now; a difference now that you look at me speak." He had placed the young man flat on his back, and was gazing up into the face of the girl with a look half of worship, half of fear.

In a few seconds Hanbury showed signs of life. His eyelids flickered, his chest heaved, his color began to return, he sighed and raised his hand. Gradually he came to himself, and with the joint aid of Leigh and Dora tottered to his feet.

Leigh had no thought of serving Hanbury. If the young man had been alone he would have left him where he stood until the convalescent was strong enough to shift for himself. But he was under a double spell, the spell of the extraordinary likeness between this girl, Miss Ashton, and that other girl, Miss Grace, and the spell of Miss Ashton's beauty. As a rule, his thought was clean, and sharp, and particular; now it was misty, dim, glorious, vague. Edith Grace had, at first sight, wrought a charm upon him such as he had never known before; Dora Ashton renewed and heightened the charm and carried it to an intolerable yearning and rapture. He was beside himself as he hurried away to get a cab he had promised to bring.

"Dora," said Hanbury, after a little while and much thought, "will you promise me one thing? Say nothing to a soul about my fainting. You will not tell your father or mother or my mother? I will be able to keep the other occasions quiet. If this got about I should have to clear out of Chicago. I'd be the laughing stock of the clubs. That man need not know more than he has seen."

"But he will return with the cab. You can ask him not to say anything about it."

"Come, Dora," he said, with sudden and feverish energy, "let us go. I feel a horrible repugnance to this place."

She took his proffered arm with a view to giving, not receiving, aid, and he hurried her along Chetwynd street until he met the first cross road leading north; into this he hastened, casting a quick glance behind, and finding to his great relief that he was not followed.

"I wonder," said the girl, looking up quietly at him, "how my name would look in print connected with this miserable affair and place, and that negro and you?"

He stopped short, dropped her arm and looked at her with an expression of alarm and apology. "Dora, Dora, I beg your pardon. I most sincerely beg your pardon. There is something wrong with me to-day. I never thought of that. You would not, Dora, be very much put out if you saw your name connected with mine in print? Our engagement is not public, but there is no reason it should not be."

It was in accordance with Dora's wishes the engagement between them had not been announced. She was intensely independent. Why should the world know they were pledged to one another? It was no affair of the world's. But to have her name bracketed with his in newspapers and then their engagement announced would be hideous, unbearable to her.

"There's a cab at the end of the street," she said.

"So there is." He started at her voice, and then called the cab. "I cannot tell you how much I am ashamed of myself, for the third time to-day," he said to her.

"Of fainting?" she asked, coldly, chillily.

"I could not help it then, but I should have taken precautions against anything of the kind by familiarizing myself with unpleasant and trying sights. No man ought to be a——"

"Woman," she said, finishing the sentence for him with an icy laugh. His want of consideration had exasperated her.

"Yes," he said gravely, "no man ought to be a woman."

At this moment the cab drew up. Hanbury opened the door and handed her in. He was about to follow when she stopped him with a gesture. "It now occurs to me that you had better go back and see that man who was so good to me, and whom you sent for the cab for yourself." Her eyes were flashing angrily now.

"Why?" he asked with the door in his hand.

"Well, I just recollect that I gave him your name and my own. You had better see him if you want to keep our names out of the papers. Drive on."

CHAPTER VII.

John Hanbury began retracing his steps. When he reached Chetwynd street he looked up and down it anxiously. He stood at the corner and drew himself up to his full height, with his chin well in, his head back, and a contemptuous look on his face.

He approached one of the little knots of people. "Could you tell me where I should be likely to see a low-sized gentleman who carries a heavy stick? I think he belongs to this neighborhood," said Hanbury to a man in a shabby jacket.

"You mean little Mr. Leigh?" said the man. "I guess he's in there," and he pointed to the public house.

Hanbury looked in, and seeing Leigh, entered. The dwarf was there alone. All the idle people had been drawn off in the wake of the negro's litter. Even Williams, the landlord, had been induced by curiosity to make one of the crowd.

"Hah," said Leigh, when he saw Hanbury come in and shut the door. "You thought better of waiting for that cab. I am glad you came back. I hope you are again quite well? Eh?" His words and accent were polite—too polite, the young man thought. There was a scornful glitter in the hunchback's eyes. A huge volume lay on the polished metal counter beside him. When Hanbury saw the volume his face flushed vividly. The book was the city directory.

"I am quite well again, thank you. I came back on purpose to see you."

"Greatly honored I'm sure," said the other man, with a quick glitter in the bright deep-sunken eyes. "May I ask you are Mr. John Hanbury?"

"That is my name."

"Hah! I thought so. I had the honor of hearing you speak——"

Hanbury looked round as though in fear of hearing his own name, and interposed: "Please do not. You will add to the great favor you have already done me if you say nothing of that kind. I am most anxious to have a little conversation—private conversation with you. In the first place, I have to thank you most sincerely for your great services to me a while ago. Believe me, I am very grateful, and shall always hold myself your debtor."

"You are too kind. It is a pleasure to do a little service for a gentleman like Mr. Hanbury, the great orator. If only Chetwynd street knew it had so distinguished a visitor it would be very proud. However, you may rest assured the public shall not be allowed to remain in ignorance of the distinction conferred upon our district. I was just preparing a little paragraph for the papers." The dwarf smiled ambiguously.

Hanbury started and colored and moved his feet impatiently, uneasily. "Mr. Leigh," he said, "you have done me a favor already, a great favor, a great service. They say one is always disposed to help one he has helped before. Do me another service, and you will double, you will quadruple, my gratitude. Say nothing to any one of seeing me here; above all, let nothing get into the papers about it."

"Hah," said Leigh, throwing himself back on his chair. "I see! I understand. A woman in the case."

(To be continued.)

PUMPING EARTH FOR A LEVEE.

Interesting Experiment Being Made by Engineers on the Mississippi.

Lieutenant Roche of the United States engineer corps, who was in charge of the levee district below New Orleans, has been trying a plan of building levees with a hydraulic pump at a point sixty miles below the city. If the experiment is the complete success that is claimed for it it would reduce the cost of levee construction to a minimum, and save the people of the lower Mississippi valley hundreds of thousands of dollars annually.

The idea is not altogether new, but the difficulty was in holding the mixture of water and river mud thrown up on the shore by the dredge. This has finally been overcome by means of planking, which keeps the mixture within a limited territory. The planking leaked at first, but the use of willows stopped the leaks, and the experiment is now a success.

The levees in Lieutenant Roche's district are being built not by manual labor, as all have heretofore been constructed, but by the mammoth steam dredge Ram. The old system was objectionable, not only because it cost a great deal, although it had fallen 75 per cent. in cost during the last ten years, but also because the levee, being made of dirt and not pounded down—this has been found impracticable—is not compact or solid enough and yields readily to the pressure of the river. Lieutenant Roche tried the system of building a levee by pumping the water and mud from the Mississippi, and now announces that it is a success. Levees can undoubtedly be built in this way, for there is the Plaquemines levee to show for it, and can be built more quickly. It is more solid and substantial than the levees built by hand, the soil being so compact that the crawfish, the bane of the Louisiana planters, cannot penetrate it, and this alone, Lieutenant Roche thinks, will make the mud levees extremely popular. The matter of cost is not thoroughly satisfactory as yet. The new pump-built levee costs about the same as one constructed with scrapers of wheelbarrows, but this is attributed to the fact that the Ram was not intended for levee building, but for dredging. A much cheaper boat can be built which will do the levee work far more satisfactorily and will reduce the cost one-half. When this is done the levee-building machine will do all the levee work along the Mississippi, and get rid of the thousands of laborers and convicts who now do the work.—New York Sun.

Passengers Travel in a Tube.

The failure of the effort to furnish New York with an acceptable plan of rapid transit has drawn renewed attention to the suitability for that purpose of the Greathead system, now operating in London. This consists of a circular car, which travels within a tube running sixty feet underground. It has been running so successfully for four years that another line on the same principle is being constructed. The cars can be made as light as day, the motion is smooth, and the supply of pure, fresh air is perfect. Accidents are made impossible by automatic appliances. The passengers are carried up and down to the stations by electric elevators. Since the system has been in operation there have been no accidents, and no serious stoppages of trains.

This system interferes with all other kinds of traffic less than any other, and is infinitely less costly when compared with the accommodation afforded and the difficulties overcome. Its construction can be carried on without the slightest surface disturbance, as it is clear of water, gas, electricity, and sewerage service, subcellars and foundations of buildings, and whatever it removes is replaced by something of greater tensile and bearing strength. It has the advantage of disturbing no existing rights; it has neither rights of way nor damage compensations to pay for. It has proved a success from both a financial and an engineering point of view, and Londoners are convinced they have the simplest and best system of rapid transit in the world.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Nearly every English flagship carries eight and every cruiser four fully qualified divers, whose duty it is to repair any damage sustained by the vessel below the water line, clearing the propellers and recovering the anchors.

NOT more than one out of a hundred of the great number of American citizens, who, on the morning following a national election, permit their breakfast to grow cold while they read the complete story of the battle of the ballots, has even the vaguest knowledge of the tremendous task imposed upon the great newspapers of the country when a presidential election comes around. Quite in line with the progress of the day are the interesting methods by which the printing press produces a perfect mirror of events political within a few hours after the last ballot has been cast, giving telegrams from every State in the Union, the vote for President by counties in tabular form, the vote on the various State tickets, the political complexion of the different Legislatures, the standing of the next United States Senate, returns from every Congressional district, a list of the new members to the House of Representatives, the legislative returns for each State, and, finally, a complete report of the election in the city and county where the newspaper is published.

How the News Is Obtained.

The methods adopted for rapidly and effectively accomplishing all this have been reduced to an accurate system by all the great dailies, but those employed by the Chicago Times-Herald are particularly efficient. To carry them out requires weeks of preparation, the most liberal expenditure of money, the employment of the most skillful labor, the exercise of the keenest intelligence, and the utmost economy of time in every direction. The details are almost innumerable, yet all of them have to be executed to the letter, so closely are they connected with each other in the system which has been devised for handling the returns. First in its importance is the work of the Associated Press. Through this great agency the paper receives telegraphic reports of the election from all parts of the Union. At least a week before election the correspondents are forwarded printed instructions, giving them the form in which they shall prepare their dispatches, and other rules for their guidance in handling the news from their localities. These instructions are designed chiefly to insure promptness, accuracy and brevity. In addition to this force the special correspondents of the newspaper itself form an army which any general would be proud to command if assembled in a body. The Times-Herald has more than 2,000 of these vigilant news gatherers scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Gulf to the frontier line on the north. These watch the polls, ready to record the figures of the election as soon as they are announced. They supply the news from those towns and cities in which the Associated Press has no representatives, and perform other special duties devolving upon them should the election be marked by any unusual incidents in their respective localities.

An avalanche of telegrams begins to get in motion very shortly after the polls are closed on the night of election. Each special correspondent, impressed with the necessity of getting his dispatches on the wires as early as possible, rushes to the telegraph office. Each correspondent of the Associated Press, animated by the same desire, enlists the aid of electricity at the earliest moment. Thousands and thousands of telegraph operators click off the messages thrown upon their desks. At the same hour the City Press Association, upon which falls the task of collecting the returns for Chicago and Cook County is busily employed. There are some States in the Union which can not boast of having more election precincts than are included in the territory covered by this association on election night. Chicago has almost a thousand precincts, in addition to which must be counted more than a hundred precincts for other townships. Yet the complete returns from every precinct in this vast territory, populated by more than 3,000,000 souls, are in the offices of the several newspapers before midnight, and the majority of the figures are in type before that hour.

The polls close at 4 o'clock in the afternoon in Chicago. The reporters of the City Press Association watch every voting place in the city an hour later. These reporters are not necessarily newspaper men. In the city proper they are mostly policemen, detailed for the special duty of carrying the news to the city hall. In the remote precincts of the county are other messengers, employed to facilitate the handling of the returns. All are under the most specific instructions to lose no time in transmitting the results from the precincts to headquarters. About three hours after the polls close the judges and clerks in most of the precincts have completed their counting. As soon as they have ascertained the vote of their precincts the result is given to the messengers in waiting. Then begins a race from all directions. Railroad trains, street cars, horses and bicycles hasten the transmission of the news to the headquarters of the Press Association, where scores of skilled accountants are in waiting to tabulate the figures for the newspapers. As fast as the figures are transcribed, a pneumatic tube carries them with lightning swiftness to the newspapers. There they are copied, as a safeguard against any emergencies, and a check against any mistakes that might arise, and are sent to the composing room. The earliest returns on election night come in the shape of bulletins from different sections of the country. In the hands of trained observers, these bulletins are compared with the vote of the previous presidential election, and thus furnish indications of the result to be expected. As the bulletins increase in number they become more definite as the hour grows later, until they begin to tell the story without any need of comparisons. The figures are copied and then handed over to the telegraph editors to be prepared for the composing room.

Where Everything Hums.

With an army of telegraph operators, editors, reporters and typesetters all working at the same time to their utmost capacity, human intelligence is necessarily taxed to its limit to meet the situation. An able-bodied youth watches the pneumatic tubes, through which an almost constant stream of leather-covered cylinders come flying, to be discharged into the glass-inclosed receiving chamber. Each of these cylinders contains from one to a dozen sheets of "flimsy," the name given by newspaper men to the yellow tissue paper used by the press associations in the duplication of their news by the manifolding process. The "flimsy" is distributed by hurrying "copy" boys between the editors, reporters and accountants, each of whom has been assigned to some special duty by his chief. On their desks are piles of heavy cardboard, ruled and labeled ready for the tabulation of the vote in the county, from President down to the local officials. Each ward, precinct and township has a separate blank, with separate blanks also for recording the vote of the Congressional and legislative districts. One man may have several of these tables to take care of. As the returns come into the office they are passed from one to another of the clerical force, who pick out the figures for their table, until the last return is duly recorded.

The expert accountants begin their work footing up the columns of figures as soon as possible. When a complete vote is obtained for any of the candidates, the total is quickly recorded on another table giving a summary of the vote, and the vote, by ward, or precinct, or outside town, is then "shot" through a pneumatic tube to the composing room above, to be set in type. Here it falls into the hands of the compositor, who sits before a typesetting machine and pounds away at a keyboard like a typewriter. When he finishes, the figures on his "copy" have been transformed into a glistening, solid line of type.

There are other matters to be looked after on election night, aside from gathering and handling the returns. Along about midnight, when the result of the election is no longer shrouded in doubt, the city editor sends a score or more of reporters scurrying around among the hotels and political headquarters. They look for the politicians and the candidates and the prominent citizens with the intention of interviewing them. The candidate is asked to tell how it happened—if he is defeated; the politician is given a chance to say "I told you so," and the prominent citizen expresses his gratification or astonishment over the result. This is about the final chapter of the story of election day, as written by the reporters. They have already recorded the scenes and incidents of the day, from the opening to the closing of the polls, with a minuteness of detail characteristic only of the metropolitan reporter.

The desire to give every bit of information possible to its out-of-town readers is the reason why big morning newspaper offices on election night are about the busiest places on earth. A composing room is always a place where hustling is in fashion, but election night brings this feature out most strongly. About 9 o'clock the first election "copy" begins to pour into the copycutters' cage, and the stream never diminishes in volume until near daylight. Since the adoption of the typesetting machines the work of putting the copy into type and making up the forms for the stereotypers has been made much easier and shorter. Between the first and second editions of the paper comes the final strain of the night. This is from 1 to 3 a. m., after the editors, reporters and accountants have disposed of a hasty lunch. Later and more accurate returns make necessary a revision of a great part of the paper. Proofs are consulted; figures are stricken out and new ones inserted; headings are rewritten; totals are changed beneath the columns to conform to the changes made in their figures, and a hundred more changes have to be made in a few minutes that the paper may go out in a finished condition. When the great presses finally begin to roll off the second edition the work of handling the returns still goes on upstairs. Important news may come in at any minute changing the aspect of the election, and provision must be made for issuing an "extra" in such an emergency. For this reason the clerical force remains at work until the forenoon is well along, and a force of compositors is retained.

Story Told by Bulletins.

The scene outside the newspapers offices, hotels and campaign headquarters on election night is one of rare excitement and interest. In a great city like Chicago "watching the returns" has become a feature of politics, attended with all the bustle, enjoyment and variety that ingenuity and intelligence can suggest. The plan adopted by the big dailies for keeping the public posted up to midnight scored some new and remarkable features this year. Intense interest in the election does not permit many city residents to remain at home on election night, and from 7 o'clock until daylight vast crowds parade the principal thoroughfares, going from point to point where bulletins are displayed. These take the form of huge canvas screens tacked across the front of a building opposite the newspaper office. Two powerful stereopticons are employed to flash the returns upon them.

By still another method the enterprising newspapers tell the story of the election for the benefit of the public, and this novel system of disseminating news was used on election night for the first time. One newspaper secured a searchlight of the greatest possible reflecting capacity, which, under the guidance of an expert, flashed a code of signals up into the sky, visible as far as fifty miles away. The Times-Herald placed men on the top of its building, and exactly on the hour, from dark until after midnight, shot up into the air bombs of different colors. These burst as high as 1,000 feet aloft, and were visible fifteen miles from any direction. Each color had its individual significance, the number fired at one time indicating city, State or national report, as the case might be, and the color designating the political complexion of affairs at that hour. The bursting of a grand battery of bombs of all colors wound up the display, announcing that the presidential question was settled, and closing the exciting campaign of 1896 in a blaze of glory.

Circumstantial.

A curate in Anjou, a man of very disorderly habits, had a quarrel with a sergeant of the neighborhood. The sergeant having suddenly disappeared, everyone suspected the curate—his avowed enemy—of having made away with him.

It happened that a criminal, who had been executed, was exposed on the gallows, within a league or two of the curate's house. His relations took down the body secretly, and threw it, with the cord about its neck, into a neighboring pond.

Some fishermen found the body, and the matter being taken up by the police, everyone flocked to see the corpse of the victim. As it was much disfigured, the prejudices which were universally entertained against the curate led them to believe that this must be the body of the sergeant.

The curate was immediately arrested, tried, and condemned to be hanged. When he saw that death was inevitable, he thus addressed his judges:

"It is true that it was I that murdered the sergeant; but I am unjustly condemned, and all those who have given evidence against me are false witnesses. The body which you have found, and on account of which I have been tried, is not that of the sergeant. The real corpse of the sergeant will be found in a certain part of my garden, along with that of his dog."

The judges immediately instituted a search within the garden of the curate, and everything was found to be as he had described.

Police Judge Who Fined Himself.

Alexander Laidlaw, whose name was once in every paper in the land as the judge who fined himself, died in Waldeck sanitarium, San Francisco, the other day, from the effects of a surgical operation. Laidlaw in his younger days was a hail fellow well met with a band of as merry fellows as ever laughed away the hours of the night. He studied law and afterward was elected police judge in Oakland. His occasional bibulous escapades became the talk of the town and attracted newspaper notice.

After an unusually boisterous outburst there was an editorial comment in the Tribune referring to the peculiar position of a judge on the bench who was called upon to sentence men for drunkenness when he himself should be in the dock.

The next morning, after the calendar in his court had been gone through, Judge Laidlaw looked down at the clerk and said:

"You will make this entry on your calendar: 'Alexander Laidlaw, drunkenness.'"

"Yes," said the astonished clerk.

"'Arrested by himself,'" the judge went on.

"Yes."

"Enter a plea of guilty."

"Yes."

"Alexander Laidlaw is fined $50. Here is the money."

At once the country rang with his fame, but from that time forward Alexander Laidlow drank no more. A supreme court decision finally ousted him from his position on the bench and he removed to San Francisco. Here he entered upon the practice of law, with fair success.

A Worthy Suggestion.

A scientist recommends that every lifeboat carried by ships should be provided with a bottom of citric acid, which precipitates chloride of sodium and converts sea water into a palatable drink.

A BOUT AT QUARTER-STAFF.

A Stout Swinehard More than Held His Own with Robin Hood.

Caroline Brown contributes a story about "George O'Green and Robin Hood" to St. Nicholas. Here is an account of the meeting between these two characters:

"How art thou called, Master Pig minder?"

"George o'Green."

"Why that?"

"Ho, ho, ho!" roared the churl. "So wise, and don't know that withal! Why, I live on the green and mind the pigs!" And he wiped the tears of laughter from his eyes on the sleeve of his fustian jerkin.

"I doubt me," said Robin, "if thou canst play with the quarter-staff."

"Ay, but I can!" said George, quickly.

"Show thy prowess, then!" said Robin, with a quick thrust at him with his white-oak staff."

"Bide here and mind the pigs till I go to yon thicket and get me a staff."

Robin consented, and gazed after the brawny man as he walked with long, slow strides to the oak thicket on the hither side of the brook. There he carefully selected a tough green sapling, almost two inches thick, and then wrenched it off near the ground with a twist of his powerful hands.

"This bodes me no good in the coming tilt," thought Robin. But though he never withdraw for any cause, rarely had he suffered defeat.

George turned him about, and, coming up to Robin, said:

"Canst lend that knife o thine? 'Tis o'er too frayed for a good staff," he said, looking at the fringe of splinters where he had snapped off the stem.

He trimmed the staff carefully, then handed back to Robin his knife. But chancing to look around, he saw the pigs scampering off to a distant corner of the common.

"Thou'st not minded the pigs! Now Goody Hoskins will rate me well!" cried George with heat, yet timidly withal.

"But Sandy didn't give me warning!" pleaded Robin.

"Good old Sandy! Faithful shoat! He knows thee not. He'll talk only to me!" and George's ill-nature left him at this proof of the faithfulness of his favorite.

He set off at full speed after the pigs, Robin at his heels. When they had got the swine back to their own feeding-ground they lay themselves down on the sort thymy turf to rest. The chase had been a right merry one, and both were short of wind; for the pigs had scampered and dodged sprightfully in a way that made the men more weary than a five-mile sprint.

George dozed off on the instant, and Robin panted loud. In ten minutes Robin prodded George with his staff, and said:

"Sluggard! Art ready?"

George yawned prodigiously, showing strong teeth, white as a young dog's, rimming his jaws. Then he rose and ran his fingers through his shock of red hair, stretched mightily, and said briefly:

"I be. Lay on!"

"Well, then," cried Robin, "stand forth now and defend thyself. I'll warrant thou wilt be no longer sleepy when I shall have done with thee!"

At once the sound of the clashing of staves filled the air. As both were so deft in handling the staff, all blows were skillfully parried. At the end of an hour Robin's arm began to weary, but George's brawny arm was unfailing. In warding off a powerful blow Robin's arm swerved, and George's staff came down on his crown with a sharp rap, the first hit made by either. For near two hours the clashing of staves kept up, when Robin's foot slipped on the thyme, and down he rolled into the brook.

"Accident" Swindlers.

The extension of electric traction has brought upon the scene a particularly dangerous and offensive swarm of rascals who prey upon the street railroad companies by bogus claims for personal injuries received in real or imaginary accidents. They are fostered by a tribe of disreputable attorneys, who make a practice of communicating with all persons whom they can identify as concerned in any street railway mishap, and often without instructions issue process against the companies. Some of these legal sharks have a regular staff of detectives, who prowl about the depots and termini of the lines on the lookout for cases. False witnesses are easily procured, and juries are usually liberal in the matter of damages, the greater portion of which is swallowed up in the attorneys' "costs." The evil has become so great that the street railway press is suggesting the formation of a mutual protection society of some kind. It is proposed to keep a register of the names of claimants, and interchange information as to persons who, it is more than suspected, make a trade of the business and travel from city to city for the purpose.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Curiously Named Garden.

There is a garden in Brixton kept by an old gentleman, which presents some curiosities in floral nomenclature. The owner has been seized with a desire to label his flowers after the manner of botanists, but, knowing nothing of scientific terms, consulted an acquaintance. The result is more amusing than appropriate, and proves the folly of wisdom where ignorance is bliss. Scientific names have been affixed to all the flowers, but strictly on the principle that "a rose by any other name will smell as sweet." One row bears the inscription "Nux vomica;" another is boldly labeled "Nisi Prius;" a third is affirmed to be "Ipecacuanha," and another to be "Particeps criminis." The amateur gardener is exceedingly proud of his collection, and no one has enlightened him on the incongruity of the descriptions.—London Telegraph.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Entered at the Auburn, Indiana office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY....NOVEMBER 12, 1896

Robinson Elected.

The Official Returns from the Counties Remove All Doubt

The Fort Wayne Journal says the official returns from all but one of the counties of the Twelfth district insure the election of the Hon. J. M. Robinson to congress by a majority of over 500. The following table gives the official vote in all the counties except Noble:

Counties	Robinson,	Leighty.
Allen	1,941	.....
DeKalb	505	.....
Whitley	174	.....
Steuben	.....	1,027
Lagrange	.....	780
Noble	.....	250
Pluralities	2,620	2,057

Robinson's plurality, 563.

The official count of the vote of Noble county may change the figures in Mr. Robinson's plurality slighty, but by no possibility can it change the result! Mr. Robinson's election is assured.

Well Said.

The COURIER indorses every word of the following item which appeared in the Columbia City Post: "It is not calculated to give one a very pleasurable sensation to hear some of our city bred young men when speaking of farmers or country people in general sneeringly refer to them as "jays." While it probably is done thoughtlessly and with no disrespectful intentions, it is none the less disrespectful. It reflects no credit upon anyone because he is well dressed to speak lightly of the man who wears the jeans and cowhide boots. They signify as much in the makeup of the man as do the broadcloth and patent leathers."

Cabinet Places.

Cabinet making, for the new president is now active. Several prominent people are stated for various positions. It is agreed that the gold democrats held the balance of power and gave republicans their victory, and are therefore to have a cabinet position. John Sherman is spoken of for the treasury and for state, Gen. Harrison is mentioned also for both these places. The COURIER would suggest, that he be made director of the mint, so he will be able to give the correct method of getting gold and silver coined under free coinage.

Elkhart's Vote.

In Elkhart county the socialist labor ticket got 13 votes, the gold democrats 25, the separate populists 12, McKinley had a majority of 917, and O. Z. Hubbel for state senator only 546. The silver prohibitionists cast 42 votes and the other wing 146 in that county. It was Elkhart county's big vote, that defeated Dr. Teal. The editor of the Goshen Times, adds: It is the man who is to not be taught anything who loses his vote by mistakes under the present ballot law.

REWARD.

To the person returning to my farm 13 head of Poland China Pigs, weighing about 60 or 70 lbs. each.

Our Side of It.

For the past three weeks, we had heard that combinations were going on among republican business men to boycott the DAILY COURIER as soon as the campaign was over. Several stopped taking it, others wished to take out their ads, some wished to do so at once, but the majority preferred to wait till "after election." The only reason we have heard was that the paper advocated democratic principles, while they did not. We did not believe they would do so foolish a thing, but on Wednesday the day after election Bishop & Lackey, and G. H Yesbera, took out their advertisements, and next day Schaab Brothers did the same. All these firms had the right to do this, if they thought the advertisements did not pay them, or that business did not justify the outlay. All business men have this right, and they exercise it, and we are always willingly to remove their ads when so instructed, even for political reasons. In this case we promptly took them out, and other firms at once took the vacant spaces, so that we have suffered no loss. The republicans said they were going to "down the DAILY." And not satisfied with this sort of talk, various malicious rumors were set afloat calculated to inflame the public and injure the paper. The almost incredible thing about the matter is that people in an intelligent community should be so intolerant. We are proud to know that no democratic business man has ever thought of boycotting the Dispatch though it has spoken more roughly of democrats than the COURIER has of republicans. Among other rumors set afloat was one that the DAILY would at once stop. They are mistaken. It will certainly not stop at the dictation of men who object to the editor's politics. This is a free country, and our political opinions and conscience are not for sale. Nor are we of the make up to be influenced by intimidation. We started the DAILY, at the suggestion of these very men. We agreed with them that it would help the prosperity of Auburn. It would raise Auburn from the grade of a "weekly paper town" to that of a "daily paper town." It was a step no one but the editor of this paper had ever dared to take in this county. But we took it, and we have succeeded as well as we expected. Now if they object to this raising of the grade and condition of Auburn, we cannot help it. It has cost us more of money and labor than it has them. If they prefer to see the town go back into the old rut, they are taking the right course to bring it about. But anything that injures the town, injures them and an injury to one business man, hurts the rest. We have in the sixteen years we have published this paper, done more to push Auburn to the front than any firm in town, and often at a loss of patronage. All other firms, work only as far as helps their own interests. It is but justice to say that one reason they give for their enmity is that after promising we would keep the DAILY out of politics, we made it a free silver paper. The promise was made, but it became impossible to keep it. The campaign became a hot one. About 100 democrats who stopped the Weekly to take the DAILY were getting no politics, while republican papers, were pitching in right and left. They demanded a good old-fashioned fight such as the COURIER has always made. It would not do to say we would put politics into the Weekly alone, they did not now take that, and if they did take it, we would be forced to largely increase our expense, to keep one paper neutral and the other political. There is not a business man in Auburn that could have afford'ed such additional outlay, or would have attempted it. So we made it a democratic paper. We have no further excuse to make. If we are to be assailed, abused and misrepresented because we believe in democratic principles and have the courage of our convictions, well and good. We are not wholly without friends in town and country—the conservative and reasonable men of all parties, and we feel assured they will appreciate the statement we now make. All we ask is our right to think and speak what we believe, without being punished for it. This right, we are able and ready and willing to defend. And we give them fair notice that the DAILY will not die. It will work for the interest of our people as it has for theirs. We are charitable enough to hope that every one of these firms will live and prosper as long as the DAILY shall.

Court.

Monday's Daily.

Work at court began in earnest this morning. The jury was in and the work of selecting one to try Webster began about ten o'clock. This, to an outsider looks like a tedious and to some extent useless process. All the jurymen are intelligent and reliable citizens and those on the regular pannel are as likely to be impartial as those who are picked up to take their place. We do not wish to be understood as saying this is all wrong, but we do believe it is greatly overdone. It was a noteworthy thing to hear attorneys ask if they had read of the affair in the "Courier" and when they said they had, object them off. The man who took his place said he took the Dispatch but he was not certain that he saw anything about the Webster matter. Another said he read the Press only, but did not remember much what it said on the subject. Both staid on. Moral. If you want the full news, read the Courier.

A little ripple was created while attorneys were getting a jury. Deputy Sheriff Platter had been requested to bring into court the revolver that Webster used that night. It was a very long one and stuck out of Platter's hip pocket so far that when he got up to walk across the room it dropped with a bang that set everyone to looking that way. When they saw what it was, some were frightened, thinking it might have gone off. The fact is it was not loaded or it might have caused trouble. Platter got rid of the weapon at once, by turning it over to Stroh.

The new clerk, Mr. Long has not got his piece well learned and it makes his face get a little red when he goes to swear a witness. He'll soon get the hang of it so he can say "Youdosolemnlyswearthatinthecase etc" as glibly as an old hand.

In the Webster case, Mrs. Webster was put on first. She is evidently a lady of intelligence and feels keenly her misfortune in being obliged to testify against her son. She could not see who shot her, but is satisfied it was Duane, as she heard a thumping step as he went down stairs. He has a cork leg. The bullet struck her right side and ranged up across below the heart to the left side The father, Henry D. Webster was called. Was born in that township.

Tuesday's Daily.

We stopped yesterday when Mr. Webster was on the witness stand and did not hear his testimony. It will be remembered that he was struck with a sort of sandbag, or rather a leather case filled with shot, and fell or staggered down the stairway. Two shots had been fired up the stairway, apparently aimed at him. But one went up into the plastered ceiling and another hit Mrs. Webster. Dr. Bowman of St. Joe testified that he helped dress the wound. Thought at first it had gone straight through her and that she would die. But later, it was found the ball had glanced around and not hit a vital spot.

August Maengke of Chicago was called. He was a drug clerk for Adolph Gaul on Clark street, that city, and Duane Webster worked there too. He recognized the revolver found on the floor in Webster's house the night of the shooting, as one he owned in Chicago. He had missed it at the drug-store and finally concluded that Webster had stolen it from him. He described the kind of cartridges, as had also Eugene Webster, a younger brother of Duane. Both said the cartridges were No. 38, and long, but the ends had been cut off so the cylinder could revolve. Eugene had seen the revolver at their house, when Duane was there a short time before the attempted robbery. Sumner Rose lives near Webster, was called over to the house in the night. Found both Mr. and Mrs. Webster lying helpless on the floor. Found a long leather sack or case on the stairway. Thinks this was what Webster was struck with. It was probably full of shot. Afterwards found tracks near the fence, not far from the house. Adjourned t'll 8:30 this forenoon. Engene Webster when on the stand yesterday produced the ball that went up into the ceiling. It had struck a hard scantling and bounded back. Jury examined this ball as they had the other and the revolver, knife, etc.

Work began again this morning. Sheriff Stroh told of his going to Chicago after Webster. Did not have a requisition from Governor of Indiana, as prisonor came without. Said prisoner showed him a newspaper clipping some one had given him telling of the shooting of his mother. Saw some sort of stain on Duane's clothes, do not know what it was. Witness identified the revolver, bullets, knife and billy or shot case. Was asked as to Webster's attempt to get out at the place where food is put in. The hole is about three feet long and 6½ inches high. Did not think a man could get through unless hole is enlarged. V. C. Bronson was called. Has practiced medicine at Newville twelve years. Was called at 2:30 a. m. morning of the shooting. He described the wound as Dr. Bowman did. Also identified the revolver and bullets, as he had examined them at the time.

Seven Years.

Wednesday's Daily.

The Webster case is ended and the young man goes to state prison for seven years. The case was given to the jury yesterday afternoon and they wrestled with the serious question all night. At five this morning they had reached a decision and when court was called at 8:30, their verdict was made public. The charge against him was assault with intent to kill, the penalty of which, if proved against him is from two to fourteen years. The jury fixed it at seven years to which is also added a fine. This ends this unfortunate case. We believe the jury did right. It was a terrible thing for a young man to break into his old home, sandbag his father and shoot his mother, and expect to rob them. The testimony against him was all circumstantial but was made plain by proving he had that revolver with the peculiar bullets when he was visiting them that week. The owner of the revolver came on from Chicago and also identified the revolver and bullets. There were other points that were also used to connect him with the crime, so that no one doubts his guilt. It was a trying thing for the parents, but we do not see how they could have done otherwise than come in and testify as they did. The attorneys in the case did good work. Mr. Shuman for the defense, did all that could be done, though there was but little to be done for his client. Mr. Davis and Mr. Welsheimer carried out the prosecution very ably. We believe Mr. Davis is making a good prosecutor. At all events when he gets started in the right direction, he makes a hot fight.

Surprise.

John Loveland who resides west of town, was captured last evening by a surprise party. It was his 48th birthday and a company mainly Maccabees and their ladies, called on them. There were over sixty present and all had a royal good time. Of course there was a big supper, and there were presents to him, including a costly chair, slippers, etc. Among the guests were L. C. Loveland and wife of Newville township.

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A M Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

BUTLER.

Two stubborn cases of sore throat are still reported in town and a few in the country.

Mrs. David McDannell has rented her farm to John Gunsenhouser and has bought the McMorgan property on East North street and moved to town with her Mary. We welcome them to our place.

The election passed off in Butler very quietly and though the canvass has been long and party feeling raised to a high degree, yet good feeling has prevailed almost without exception. A few little altercations have occurred and blows struck on two or three occasions, stil very little bitter feeling has been engendered. When we consider that this canvass approached the nearest to that of '60 which culminated in the great war of the Rebellion of any one since that one, it is more a wonder that it ended so peacefully.

The ratification last Saturday night in which Edgerton joined Butler in the noisiest time its oldest citizen ever heard passed off in good humored endurance. At ten o'clock everything had quieted and no one would have known that the people had just chosen one of their greatest leaders for President.

The promised good times and improvment after the election of McKinley has struck Butler as it has thousands of other towns, our manufacturers are already planning to erect large and commodious additions to their works, and to not only take on the old force but to largely augment it. There is something in ante-election promises this time.

Spencerville is the banner town in our county for sick democrats. Even the doctors look as if they had changed places with their sickest patients.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

In the past three months I have cleared $660,75 selling Dish Washers. I did most of the work, my brother helped some. I expect to do better next month, as every Dish Washer sold advertises itself and sells several more; I don't have to leave the house. People hear about the Dish Washers and send for them, they are so cheap. Any lady or gentleman can make money in this business, as every family wants a Dish-Washer. Any of our readers who have energy enough to apply for an agency can easily make from $8 to $10 per day. You can get full particulars by addressing the Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Try it and publish your success for the benefit of others.

The True Remedy

W M. Repine, editor Tiskilwa, Ill., "Chief," says: "We won't keep house without Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds. Experimented with many others, but never got the true remedy until we used Dr. King's New Discovery. No other remedy can take its place in our home, as in it we have a certain and sure cure for Cough's Colds, Whooping Cough, etc." It is idle to experiment with other remedies, even if they are urged on you as just as good as Dr King's New Discovery. They are not as good, because this remedy has a record of cures and besides is guaranteed, it never fails to satisfy. Trial bottles free at Robbins & McCord's drugstore. 4

Marry This Girl Somebody'

I have been reading in your paper about several men and women, that have been very successful selling self-heating flat-irons, and I concluded I would see what a girl could do. I have worked 12 days and have sold 151 irons and have $218 left after paying all expenses. Everybody is delighted with it, as people think they can't afford to be without one as they save fuel and time and don't burn the clothes. I know I can clear five thousand dollars in a year. How is that for a girl? A GRADUATE.

Splendid, my girl, splendid, you are a true American girl. Someone can get complete information about the self-heating iron by addressing J. F. CASEY & CO., ST. LOTIS MO. It seems to be a winner, as everybody selling it writes in its praise. 3

Marry This Girl Quick.

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad odor and saves oil, it is easy to sell. If you wish to try it send 13 cent stamps to Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A. St. Louis, Mo, and she will send you sample outfit, this is a good way to make money around home.

tf Miss TINA W.

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. H. tf

The Wonderful Churn.

I want to add my testimony to the list of those that have used the Lightning Churn. It does all that is claimed of it; you can churn easily in one minute and get a large percentage more butter than with the common churns. I never took the agency for anything before, but so many of my neighbors wanted churns that I ordered 30 and they are all gone. I think in a year nearly every farmer will have a Lightning Churn, in fact they can't afford to be without one as they make so much more butter, and a good little bit of money can be made in every township selling these churns. By writing to J. F. Casey & Co., St. Louis, Mo., you can get circulars and full particulars about the churn. A READER. 3

—The election of McKinley has already brought prosperity. The Body factory resumed work this morning after standing idle many months. Joe Robbins was home this weekto vote, for although he had been some time working at Ft. Wayne, he had retained his residence here. He had told a number of citizens that he would cinsider this his residence for voting, and on arriving here called them to witness that he was as good as his word. He brings the first authentic account of Ollie Robbins' fight with the thieves, who nearly killed him. In trying to prevent them from stealing his employer's property, they nearly hacked and stabbed him to prices, twenty-one cuts and stabs being found on his person. He hung between life and death for a long time, but lived through it, though not yet a sound man. The ungrateful company that he nearly gave up his life for, let his pay stop at once, and give him no help or care, and he has got no work as yet.

—We expect Charlie Brown will blush a little when he receives his first envelope addressed "Hon. C. M. Brown," and Dr. Nusbaum will have to get accustomed to the usual courtesy of being addressed in that body and everywhere else as "Senator," However, we believe both will wear their honors modestly and perform their duties in a way to reflect credit on the counties that sent them.

—As the season for the general use of bicycles is about closed, wheelmen are commenting considerably on the style of wheel for 1897. It is said, on good authority, that at least four of the large bicycle manufacturers will put the chainless wheels on the market next season. One inventor in the east is working on an idea which he thinks will revolutionize bicycle manufacture. While he believes in the chainless wheel he is working on one in which he wishes to avoid the beveled gear, and he thinks that he has discovered a way to do it.

—Dr. Nusbaum is in his office again and ready for calls from all his patients, former ones and new ones. He has dropped politics, and will be untiring in his attention to his professional duties. Of course when January comes, he will be absent sixty days attending to his duties as a senator but that is at a time when physicians have little to do. HOW TO PREVENT CROUP.

SOME READING THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO YOUNG MOTHERS. HOW TO GUARD AGAINST THE DISEASE

Croup is a terror to young mothers and to post them concerning the cause, first symptoms and treatment is the object of this item. The origin of croup is a common cold. Children who are subject to it take cold very easily and croup is almost sure to follow. The first symp on is hoarseness: this is soon followed by a peculiar rough cough, which is easily recognized and will never be forgotten by one who has heard it. The time to act is when the child first becomes hoarse. If Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is freely given all tendency to croup will soon disappear. Even after the croupy cough has developed it will prevent the attack. There is no danger in giving this remedy for it contains nothing injurious. For sale by Davenport the Druggist. 48

SIX weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. WM. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by Davenport the Druggist. 48

GOES TO M'KINLEY.

Ohio Man Elected by a Large Majority.

SEEMS A LANDSLIDE.

All Eastern States Support the Gold Ticket.

SOLID SOUTH IS INVADED.

Republican Gains in States Heretofore Democratic.

Great Pivotal Commonwealths Give Unprecedented Majorities—The Vote of the Entire District North of the Ohio and East of the Mississippi Cast Solidly for McKinley—He Also Gets Enough of the Balance to Elect Him—Heavy Majority in the East—Latest Returns Make a Better Showing for Bryan in the West.

William McKinley has been elected President of the United States. His total vote in the electoral college, according to returns at hand when this is written, will be 263, with Kentucky and Wyoming still in doubt. Whichever side wins in Kentucky, conservative judges say the plurality will not be over 1,000. In Tennessee the figures seem to bear out Democratic claims of victory for Bryan by at least 10,000. The McKinley people present totalized figures by sections tending to prove that the Ohioan's plurality will be several thousand, but it would seem, judging by the returns, that the burden of proof rests upon them.

Whether McKinley has over 263 votes in the electoral college depends upon the official returns from two States. In Kentucky the result hinges upon the vote in two counties, in the extreme eastern part of the State—a mountainous, "moonshining" region, in which there are neither railroads nor telegraph lines. But even with these counties heard from the contest is so close that nothing short of the official canvass will be decisive. The plurality for either ticket will be one of hundreds—probably less than 500. The conflicting claims of the rival State chairmen go for nothing. Wyoming, which was first thought safely to be in the Bryan column, although by a narrow margin, is now counted among the McKinley States. The plurality will be about 500, and the Legislature will be of the same party faith. The situation in Wyoming, however, is substantially the same as that in Kentucky. The district still to be heard from is 200 miles from a telegraph office and the missing returns may not be received for some time. Should Bryan carry both Kentucky and Wyoming McKinley will still have a majority considerably more than enough to give him possession of the White House for four years to come.

Early returns indicating the result of the presidential election were from the cities where McKinley and Hobart made their heaviest gains. Returns received from the country districts, where the free silver idea had gained greatest currency, considerably reduce early estimates of Republican pluralities in several of the States. The returns, however, show that McKinley not only carried all the "doubtful" States of the middle West from Ohio to Iowa, together with New York and the New England States, but that he invaded the States of Maryland, Kentucky, West Virginia and, possibly, Tennessee, either winning in all of these States or making such gains as must give him a signally large popular vote. He carried every State in the great region lying east of the Missouri and north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers. There is not a break between the rivers and the ocean. Even Delaware joins the McKinley column.

In the battleground of the middle West the majorities are amazing. Illinois leads, with nearly 150,000, of which Chicago contributed 57,339. Gov. Altgeld is defeated by more than 100,000. The State outside Chicago shows unexpected Republican gains. Wisconsin gives McKinley a plurality of 102,000, and later returns may raise these figures. Indiana is claimed by 20,000 and Michigan by 53,000. Iowa gives 72,000 and Minnesota adds 50,000 more. In the East the McKinley majorities are tremendous. Pennsylvania eclipses all records with a plurality approaching 300,000. New York is estimated at 275,000 in the latest returns. Massachusetts has given 168,000, and all the other New England States give large majorities. Ohio is put at 50,000.

The great cities of the country have given surprising McKinley majorities. Philadelphia heads the list with 125,000. Chicago, which was Democratic four years ago, is second with 50,000. New York City, which has not been carried by the Republicans in a presidential election since the war, gives McKinley 16,500. Louisville, the metropolis of Kentucky, comes up with 12,000. Indianapolis, which was carried for Cleveland by 1,000 in 1892, now gives McKinley 12,000. Lincoln, Neb., Mr. Bryan's home, is 2,000 for McKinley. The Democratic cities of Rochester and Albany, N. Y., are now Republican. Detroit (Wayne County) is reported at 18,000. St. Louis and Kansas City have given heavy Republican majorities.

The Palmer and Buckner ticket is everywhere returned at small figures, indicating that four-fifths of the gold Democratic vote has been given to McKinley. McKinley's plurality of the popular vote appears to be nearly 1,000,000. The greatest popular plurality ever given a presidential candidate in the past was 763,000 for Gen. Grant in 1872.

JONES TO THE NATION.

He Analyzes the Causes Which Led to McKinley's Election.

Chairman James K. Jones, of the Democratic National Committee, gives his analysis of the causes which led to McKinley's election in the following official address, which he issued as his final admission of defeat:

The result of the presidential election is apparently no longer in doubt. It has been one of the closest contests that the people have been called on to determine in recent years. We have claimed the election on our advices from States that were admittedly in doubt, in which we knew there had been many frauds, and from which there were evidences of tampering with the returns.

It seems now to be apparent that, while Mr. Bryan, after making the most brilliant campaign in the history of our country and has carried most of the States claimed to be doubtful, has not carried enough to assure his success in the electoral college. Bryan electors have been chosen from all of the States south of the Potomac and Ohio except West Virginia and all those west of the Missouri except California and Oregon. He has 190 electoral votes, and this number may be increased by final returns from States yet in question. He has not obtained enough votes to carry the electoral college.

Thus this remarkable campaign closes with the election of William McKinley. The result was brought about by every kind of coercion and intimidation on the part of the money power, including threats of lockouts and dismissals and impending starvation; by the employment of by far the largest campaign fund ever used in this country, and by the subornation of a large portion of the American press.

The President-elect and his party are under pledge to the American people to continue the gold standard, and by its operation to restore prosperity to this country. As chief executive, Mr. McKinley will have the cordial support of millions of patriotic Americans who have cast their votes for William Jennings Bryan. They bow to the majesty of the office and abide by the result.

They are confident the gold standard cannot give the promised prosperity, but will gladly welcome it if it comes. They will continue the great struggle for the uplifting of humanity and in the maintenance of the dignity of our country in the establishment of an American money system. And the Democratic party, aided by its present allies, will still uplift the bimetallic standard and bear it on to victory. JAMES K. JONES.

CANDIDATES RECEIVE THE NEWS

Result of the Election Made Known to McKinley and Bryan.

Seated in the library of his own house, in his own town, surrounded by his family, Maj. McKinley received the news of his election.

On election morning, just as the voters in the nation were beginning to go to the polls to deposit their ballots for or against him, Maj. McKinley blacked his own shoes and shaved himself as usual. An ordinary man would be apt to cut himself while shaving under the circumstances, because of the excitement he would experience, but Maj. McKinley was certainly calm and free from excitement, perfectly cool and collected, as he has been all his life. He had never seemed to be excited over the election. His supporters throughout the country have laughed and wept over the contest more than he, and most of them have been under a more intense nervous strain. Wires had been placed in an adjoining room by the telegraph companies for receiving returns at large, but in addition to this a special wire connected the McKinley home with Chicago, where several prominent members of the force at national headquarters were located, and a long-distance telephone kept him in communication with Chairman Hanna at Cleveland. The telephone company arranged also a special circuit taking in New York headquarters, Senator Quay's home and that of Vice Presidential Candidate Hobart.

Like Major McKinley, Mr. Bryan preserved an admirable equanimity throughout the day. He showed no severe traces of his arduous campaigning, and, except when in communication with his aids at Chicago, took part in the many pleasant chats that relieved the hours of waiting. Both candidates are men of superb powers of self-control, and both received the final news with a certain philosophical bearing that is an eminent characteristic of American statesmen.

The tollgate raiders have not left a tollgate on a single pike in Franklin County undisturbed, and the owners of these roads are very much incensed at the destruction of their property, and will take such action as will bring the raiders to justice.

THE NEW CONGRESS.

Returns Indicate Republican Control of Both Branches.

Late returns confirm first reports that Congress will contain a gold standard majority in both branches. The present Senate, which has stood forty-seven to forty-two in favor of silver, will be succeeded by one which will consist of forty-seven gold supporters to forty-two free coinage advocates. Politically the Senate will be Republican, the new body having forty-nine of that political faith to forty Democrats.

Party lines will be somewhat broken in the Senate by the silver question. Messrs. Teller of Colorado, Dubois of Idaho, Mantle of Nevada, Cannon of Utah and Wilson of Washington are extreme silver men, who will act with the Democratic party on the currency issue. On the other hand, five Democrats—Messrs. Gray of Delaware, Lindsay of Kentucky, Caffrey of Louisiana, Smith of New Jersey, and Martin of Virginia—are gold Democrats, who supported the Palmer ticket, and will act with the Republicans.

VICE PRESIDENTIAL VOTE.

Fusion and Special Conditions Divide It in Some States.

In many of the States carried by Bryan for President there is a division of the electoral vote on the vice presidency, due to the fact that a fusion was arranged between Democrats and Populists. The Democratic electors are pledged to Arthur Sewall and the Populist electors to Thomas E. Watson. In some States the Populists indorsed Bryan and Sewall electors by the terms of their fusion, while in Oregon and South Dakota the Democrats indorsed the Bryan and Watson electors.

EDUCATIONAL COLUMN

NOTES ABOUT SCHOOLS AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

Schoolrooms Should Be Made Inviting—Modern High School Building in Minneapolis—Suggestions from a Teacher's Note Book.

Decoration of the Schoolroom.

Too long have our school rooms been bare and uninviting places where a certain amount of work was to be accomplished, necessary fixtures in an educational scheme, but nevertheless places which were entered dutifully at 9 o'clock and quitted with joy and alacrity when the hands of the clock crept round to four. But the dawn of a new era is upon us; for education in its broadest sense is conceived to mean the training of the mind to see, to think and to act, to the development of power, and not to the slavish working out of tasks. It means the bringing of broadening influences to bear upon the mind, and the development of a true culture which shall lead to wise, right living, and the attainment of a more beautiful public life. This means a spiritual and not a material development, a growth of the soul, upward and outward, a growth which must of necessity be fostered and influenced by the contemplation of the productions of great thinkers and workers of all time. This is the reason for the introduction of the study of literature based upon the masterpieces of the great authors; and this, if we are consistent in our theory, is the reason for the introduction of art education with its all-uplifting influences, for wider appreciation of the artistic monuments of all the ages.

If we are to look to a greater appreciation of art productions and a more refined public taste in the citizen of the future, we must lay the foundation for that mental development in the public schools of to-day. We must surround the child, at least while in school, with walls which are clean and pleasantly tinted, and hung with appropriate art reproductions in photography or engraving. Blackboards should be shielded with pleasing but inexpensive drapery curtains suspended from shelf-like moldings whereon are placed casts and simple effects in pottery, to cultivate a love of form. Good reproductions in color, to develop a sense now so conspicuously lacking in our American life, should not be forgotten; and plants and sunshine should be allowed to do their best to satisfy the innate longings for outdoor life, so characteristic of the child. The true object of the existence of pictures and the other decorations in the school room is to help educate the scholars therein. Primarily, the character of the decorations must be in harmony with the mental development of the child; and if they are to serve their broadest purpose they must be so selected that they will not only act as incentives and inspiration in the study of history, geography, or literature, but will also breathe a constant, subtle influence toward art education. That scheme of decoration which shall embrace all these desirable features is one which will require much experience and elaboration to prepare with success. Indeed, it may be questioned whether any one person has the broad insight to arrange it with absolute wisdom. The cities that have the greatest progress in this matter are those which have been fortunate in placing their funds in the hands of broad-minded committees, composed of educators of so varied a training that the historic, literary, musical and geographical element, as well as the decorative side, receive due representation.—Public Opinion.

From a Teacher's Note Book.

Teach the children to listen. Teach them to reflect on the pleasure to be derived from the sense of hearing. Listen. Close your eyes and rest. Shut out all those jarring, distracting impressions which come to you through the sense of sight, and listen. What do you hear? "I hear the clock tick, and some one moving his feet." "I hear some one breathing, and that fly beating on the window pane." "I hear the door shaking just a little, and the wind sways a map against the wall."

Now enlarge your hearing; listen for impressions from the outside. What do you hear now? "I hear the gentle rustle of leaves in the wind, and the swish of the waves on the shore." "I hear the sparrow chirp, chirp, and a squirrel scurry up the bark of that tree." "I hear the hammer very faintly in the distance." "I hear crunch, crunch as if some one were walking in the leaves, and the bark of a dog." "I hear the sharp crack of falling nuts, and the steady distant clatter of hoofs on frozen ground."

Do you like to listen? Which of these sounds do you like best? Had you rather hear a child laugh or cry? Why? Had you rather hear a cat purr or cry in pain? Why? What is the difference in your feeling? Tell me some sounds you like. Some that you don't like. Can you tell when a dog barks in welcome? in pain? in warning? in ugliness? Can you tell a sparrow's song from a robin's? Can you tell the difference between beating with a stick on a piece of tin; of wood; of cloth? Did you ever think of the poor little children who never have heard even a mother's voice? Can you talk? Why not?

When you listened only for the inside things did you hear the outside things? Did you hear all that was to be heard, or just what you listened for? Here is your lesson: can you teach it?—American Teacher.

School Children's Eyes.

The British Education Department some time ago appointed a committee, with the well-known expert Brudenell Carter at the head, to examine the eyesight of children in the public elementary schools. The report of the committee, which has just been published, says that out of 8,125 children tested, 3,181, or 39.15 per cent., were found to have normal vision in both eyes; 1,016, or 12.5 per cent., had normal vision in the right eye and subnormal in the left; 700, or 8.6 per cent., had normal vision in the left eye and subnormal in the right, and 3,228, or 39.7 per cent., had subnormal vision in both eyes. Comparing the sexes, the total was made up of 3,928 boys and 4,197 girls, of whom the boys had normal vision in both eyes in 1,718, or 37 per cent., and the girls only 1,403 or 33.4 per cent. Subnormal vision in both eyes was found in 1,332 boys, or 33.9 per cent., and in 1,896 girls, or 45.1 per cent. Normal right eyes, with subnormal left, were found in 522, or 13.3 per cent., of boys, and in 494, or 11.77 per cent., of girls, while subnormal right eyes, with normal left, were found in 356, or 9 per cent., of boys, and in 344, or 8.2 per cent., of girls. Mr. Carter, commenting upon these facts, says: "I think it may be concluded that the eyes of the children whom we examined and presumably those of London school children generally, are in no way injuriously affected by the conditions of elementary school life. The great cause of alarm to school managers has now for some years been progressive myopia; but I failed to find evidence of any extended prevalence of this condition." He also remarks: "The visual power of London children is not cultivated by their environment. They see the other side of the street in which they live and the carts and omnibuses of the thoroughfares. With a country child the case is widely different. He has an expanse of landscape before him, presenting numerous objects under visual angles rendered small by distance. He finds attractions in every hedge-row, flowers, insects, birds, nests, many of them disguised by their resemblance in color to their surroundings and requiring close scrutiny in order that they may be distinguished. His eyes are exercised beneficially in his daily life, and his vision would probably be found somewhat to exceed the very moderate standard of normality, just as that of the town child is apt to fall below it."—Philadelphia Item.

Pictures.

An exchange says there are two main uses for pictures in schools; one to exercise and develop the aesthetic sentiment or the feeling for beauty—with which object the walls of the class-rooms, halls, and corridors should be hung with pictures; the other to convey information to the mind, to fix it there, and to exercise the faculty of constructive imagination. With regard to the latter use it may be pointed out that it has long been accepted as an axiom that the best explanation of a thing is the sight and study of the thing itself; and the next best is a photograph or extract unembellished picture of the thing. This mode of explaining and conveying information has been largely used from quite early times, but is still capable of considerably greater development—especially in the department of geography and history. But besides conveying information, pictures may be used, and indeed are almost indispensable, for the cultivation of one of the most valuable of the intellectual faculties—the constructive imagination; both when the mental images constructed are exact or nearly exact copies of some original which exists or has existed (as in geography and history), and when the constructions are new combinations of material already acquired (as in science and in art, both literary and pictorial; in which latter case—when the combinations are new—pictures serve the purpose of suggestive models. The use of pictures as aids to the memory is too widely recognized to need more than mention. There is one misuse of them, however, which cannot be too often protested against; and that is in lessons of observation. In such cases pictures can never be properly used except when pictures themselves are the things to be observed. To study a picture instead of the thing itself differs hardly at all from studying a written account of the thing.

Modern School Buildings.

The new high school building in North Minneapolis, Minn., is one of the most attractive and stately structures of its kind in the Northwest. It is 162 by 82 feet and is in the style of the Romanesque. The base is of native blue stone and the superstructure of fire brick. The trimmings are of Kettle River sandstone, and the roof of Washington slate. In the basement are the manual training department, the drawing-rooms, engine and boiler rooms, etc. On the first floor are recitation and school rooms, library and geography and physiology departments. On the second floor are class-rooms. On the top floor is an assembly-room with a seating capacity of 1,000. The building is thoroughly equipped for educational purposes, and is lighted with gas and electricity and heated with steam.

VIOLET CULTURE.

A Profitable Industry in the Vicinity of New York.

The opening of the season for the sale of violets calls attention to the cultivation of these popular flowers, which is carried on to a considerable as well as a remarkably profitable extent in the vicinity of New York. They are grown in large quantities on Long Island and in the counties of Westchester and Rockland, and also across the borders of Connecticut, for sale in this city. Their culture is interesting and absorbing as a pastime; as an occupation, when properly conducted, it is more remunerative than any security listed on the Stock Exchange. It does not astonish violet growers in the least to find, when the season closes, in the spring, that their gross profits amount to 100 per cent and over, while their net profits come to 50 per cent and more; but, on the other hand, they are frequently surprised to discover their entire crop fail of a sudden through accident, neglect, ignorance or disease. Therefore, the cultivation of violets for sale is, in one sense, little more than a gamble.

While there are a number of people engaged in raising these flowers as their sole means of obtaining a living, there are others who, owning a place in the country and depending upon some profession or business for their support, still find it advantageous to add considerably in this manner to their income. And the amateurs are often quite as successful as the professional growers.

A typical case will serve as an illustration. A gentleman practising his profession in the country erected on his grounds a few years ago a small greenhouse for violets, more as an amusement and recreation than anything else. He carefully studied the nature of the plant, and became thoroughly familiar with the conditions most favorable to its growth and flowering. Such blooms as he raised found a ready sale in town. Seeing there was money to be made in the undertaking, he gradually enlarged his greenhouses. They are now extensive enough to cover about twenty thousand plants. Some years have been more profitable than others, as a matter of course; but no season has been in any sense a failure, and most of the time the net returns have been very satisfactory. Another man, a neighbor, starte aolv dltsndA shrdu vbgkqjet started a violet house over three years ago. The first year he met with a total failure. The second year he managed to pay expenses. The third year, either because his luck turned or because he understood the business better, he had a fine crop that amply compensated his efforts.

The reason why violets are difficult to grow are many. In the first place, the violet is one of the most tender and sensitive of plants. Indeed, it ought to be called the sensitive plant. It requires constant care and attention; and it is liable to be destroyed by a disease of its own, known as the "violet disease," besides being subject to all the ills that plants are heir to. However, the violet disease, which is of fungous origin, may be eradicated when the proper measures are promptly taken to stop it. The spotted leaves must be removed and burned or thrown away at a distance; otherwise the fungus germs will be carried by the air to the good plants. While nearly every grower has his own "points" as secrets which may be of more or less value, there are certain fundamental principles which must be followed in violet raising without fail. These relate to ascertaining and maintaining the proper condition of light, heat and moisture under which the violet flourishes, and without which it dies. To keep these matters right during the greater part of the year is in itself no small task. Too much light will fade the blooms; too much water will bring on dropsy.—New York Post.

Electric Railway Switch.

A method by which a switch may be operated by the motorman of a car as it approaches the switch was recently given a public test in New York.

The switch apparatus consists of a double solenoid motor and a current reversing switch, all of which are contained in a box under the switch tongue, 18x36 inches in size. The electric current is applied by means of the regular controller through an insulated section of track near the switch terminal. On approaching the switch if the motorman sees that it is placed right for him he shuts off the current, allowing the car to skid over the insulated section. If, however, the switch tongue is not in the right position for the track he wishes to take, he leaves the current on, or if necessary gives a little more current when the insulated section is reached, and the switch is thereby instantly thrown in the direction required.

The whole apparatus is extremely simple and constructed in a very substantial manner, and it is claimed to be perfectly impossible for any part to get out of order. No extra fixture is necessary on the car, the simple act of turning on or off the current while the car is on the insulated section being all that is necessary to operate the switch.

Novel Use for Sheep Brains.

Professor Burt G. Wilder, of Cornell University, in a recent address in Boston advocated the putting of the brains of sheep into the hands of school children, even in the primary department, for the purpose of scientific study. "Schoolboys," he said, "may describe the rivers of Africa and even the canals of Mars, and yet know little about the topography of their own cerebrum." By putting the brains of a sheep into their hands, even in the primary department, they are soon interested in the subject, he declared. "Should this plan be tried in good faith," said Dr. Wilder, "I venture the prediction that out of the first hundred led so to learn all will be made better citizens and parents; a score will be more perfectly qualified to teach or to practice medicine or law or to preach theology, and at least one will become an investigator and contribute to the honor of his country and the enlightenment of the world."—New Orleans Picayune.

Magnets Set to Work.

This seems to be emphatically the age of work. Elephants have been set to pulling stumps and rolling logs, and now electro-magnets have been pressed into service in England for the lifting of heavy masses of iron and steel. The magnets are attached to cranes, and are operated by a current from an electric-power circuit. When the current is on, they grip their load with a lifting strength equal to two tons; but when the current is turned off, they instantly let go. An instance of the application of such a magnet is cited where work which formerly occupied six men for ninety minutes can now be down by three men and the magnet in the space of fifteen minutes.

HYSTERICS.

WOMEN SHOULD UNDERSTAND THIS NERVOUS DERANGEMENT.

A Symptom of Something Far More Serious—Mrs. Barris, of Beaver Springs, Relates Her Experience.

The spasm at top of wind-pipe, or in bronchial tubes, the "ball rising in the throat," violent beating of the heart; laughing and crying by turns; muscular spasms; throwing the arms about, etc., tell of a derangement of the female system.

Any female complaint may produce hysterics, which must be regarded as a symptom only. The cause, whatever it may be, yields quickly to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It acts at once upon the organ affected, and the nerve centers; removes the cause, and dispels effectually the symptoms.

Mrs. Barris relates her experience for the benefit of others.

"I had been sick with ulceration of the womb, causing all kinds of disagreeable experiences, such as irritability, sleeplessness, faintness, and at times hysterics. My physician said it was the worst case he ever had. My back ached, leucorrhœa very profuse, and I had a severe bearing-down pain. The physicians thought I should never recover, and as the last remedy, they procured your Vegetable Compound. I had not taken more than one-fourth of a bottle, before I was more comfortable. I continued its use, also the Sanative Wash, and Liver Pills. After using four bottles, I was able to be out, and do almost all my work. I think the Vegetable Compound is the only medicine that will cure female complaints, and it will reach the worst cases in a very short time. I know it saved my life."—MRS. M. A POSTMISTRESS PRO TEM.

By Tom Hall.

I will introduce myself as Mr. Frank Wheaton, one of the younger members of the St. Paul bar, and at the period of these events visiting in New York. To be as brief in explanation as possible, my friends had concluded that it was high time for me to be married. My protestations were overruled, and although my heart had never experienced the gentle passion for any particular girl, I eventually picked one out from the number of my fair acquaintances, and decided to offer myself to her. Miss Violet Pierson, of New York, was as good as she was beautiful, and was an heiress besides. I arranged with my partner for a short vacation, and proceeded to New York and offered myself, one fine June day, to the young lady, in person. Violet received my proposition with as much dignity as I made it, assured me of her esteem, told me she would consult with her parents and give me an answer on the next day. As I had never had the pleasure of meeting either father or mother, I left with her a photograph of myself with my autograph on the back, that they might in some manner judge of my character. If I had been pleading the cause of another I should have marked it "Exhibit A." But I have always been careless of my own interests, and to tell the truth I was so embarrassed during the entire interview that I lost for a time all my business acuteness.

After leaving Violet's Fifth avenue home, I proceeded on my way down town to meet, for the first time in several years, my old college chum, Jack Dennett. At Union Square, I attempted to board a cable car as it swung around what I know now as Dead Man's Curve. And then—

Then I awoke in the Presbyterian Hospital, with Jack bending tenderly over my bed.

"Not a word," said Jack, cautiningly. "You are not even to think. You had a severe concussion of the brain, my dear fellow, and nothing but complete rest will get the contents of that head of yours back into shape."

"I must see Violet at once," I whispered.

"Drop that," said Jack, authoritatively. "You have been seeing violet and every color of the rainbow ever since you were hurt. Not another word now."

With that he left me. I will not describe the monotonous existence of the next three weeks of my life; but a day came eventually when they put me on the cars, destined for a quiet little town in the Adirondacks, where a quiet life, the air of the woods, and absolute rest from all the worry and care of this world were to complete the cure. It was a place recommended by a friend of Jack's, who had once been threatened with insanity. He assured Jack that no human being could possibly find anything to think about in that town except sleeping and eating. Hence it was just the place for me. So off Jack shipped me, clad in a suit of clothes from his own wardrobe (mine had been ruined in the accident), and with linen of all descriptions, from the same place. Jack and I were exact mates in size, so he had not troubled himself to go through my trunk for supplies. And as he said good-by to me the dear fellow shoved seventy-five dollars in bills into my hands, a ticket into the ribbon around my hat, and a long flat parcel done up in brown wrapping paper onto the seat beside me. He told me to write to him for more money when the seventy-five was exhausted, and made me promise to look at the contents of the package four times daily—before each meal and on going to bed. Jack said it was his prescription. By the way, Jack was always peculiar.

That night I slept under the hospital roof of a cleanly old widow, a Mrs. White, in the little town of L——. I had been enjoined to stay there at least six weeks, so I paid her in advance my board and washing for that time. This left me about $6 in cash, most of which I laid out in cheap novels, tobacco, pipes, writing materials and stamps. And I adorned my room with the contents of the brown paper covered parcel. It proved to be a framed motto, and the mandate on it was "Don't Worry."

I spent the first few days of my stay in writing letters—the first and longest of which, you may be sure, was to Miss Violet Pierson, explaining at length the reason for my failure to call upon her again, and my present condition. And I begged her, of course, to let me know my fate at once by mail. In spite of Jack's motto I was already beginning to worry. On the third day of my stay I went to the little village post office and asked for letters for Mr. Frank Wheaton. I expected to find in the village postmaster the usual senile old man so common in such places. But framed in the little arched window of that country post office was the head of a venus worthy the hand and brush of a Titan. My embarrassment in the presence of Miss Violet Pierson was absolutely insignificant compared with my trepidation in the presence of this auburn haired, rose-cheeked, star eyed postmistress. In a word, I was smitten at first sight.

"If this be love," though I, "I've got it bad, and I've got something more to worry about, too."

"Have you anything by which to identify yourself?" said the pretty postmistress, with a smile that disclosed two rows of pearly teeth.

"Will old letters do?" I asked, falteringly.

"I guess so," she replied. "But I'm not very well informed, and I have to be careful. You see, I'm only Postmistress pro tem. This is the way I spend my vacation. It's fun for a city girl, you know, and it gives my uncle, the real Postmaster, a chance to go up in the woods and rest."

"Of course, you must be careful," said I, endeavoring to conceal my embarrassment behind a patronizing air. "My mail is of the greatest importance. But these letters will satisfy you as to my identity." With this I drew from the inner pocket of my coat a bunch of old leetters and handed them to her. She glanced at them at first curiously. Then she frowned and drew the contents from several of them and read them hurriedly. Finally she spoke.

"I believe you asked for mail for Mr. Frank Wheaton?" said she.

"I thought her tone a trifle severe. But I answered: "I did."

"Then I am afraid you are not as honest as you look, Mr. John Dennett," she replied, accenting the name in a manner peculiar to angry women.

The situation nearly took my breath away. Jack had left some old letters in his pocket. I was wearing his coat, and I had fully identified myself as another person.

"This is an unfortunate mistake," I tried to explain, weakly. "I am wearing a coat belonging to a friend of mine and did not know there were any letters in the pocket. Naturally I——"

"Wearing another man's coat," she mused. "Goodness, I hope you're not a burglar! I must notify our constable the moment I close up the office for the day. That will be very soon, now. If you want to escape you'd better hurry."

I have been in predicaments before, and I paid no attention to her, or tried not to.

"Will you be kind enough to tell me whether there are any letters here for Mr. Frank Wheaton?" I asked, as coolly as possible.

"O, I don't mind telling you that. In fact, I have taken especial interest in them. You see, nobody semes to know who he is, and he must be a gentleman, because he has a letter from a lady, and the envelope is of the very latest fashion. I'm going to get some of the same kind myself. Besides that, there are several letters from men. Now, you evidently know who he is, or you would not try to get his mail. I've done you a favor; will you tell me who he is, and where he is living?"

"I am he," I answered.

"Look me straight in the eyes and repeat that," she commanded, very seriously.

"I am he," I repeated, looking straight into the prettiest blue eyes this side of heaven.

"Too bad," she said, with a shake of her head. "Mamma told me once that a man who could look you straight in the eyes and could then tell an untruth must be a very bad man."

I turned on my heel and walked out. It was time to swear, and it is a matter of principle with me never to swear before a woman. And I never forget this principle before a pretty woman. I went home to my room and looked at Jack's motto. I wanted to smash the mocking thing with my clenched fist, but I went down to Mrs. White for consolation instead. I told her my story. This is the consolation I got:

"Young man," said she, "I suspected you from the first. Any man who pays his board six weeks in advance ought to be suspected. Honest men don't have to do that sort of thing. I have no doubt that you are John Dennett. Your clothes are all marked with that name. And you have been trying to steal Mr. Wheaton's letters, poor gentleman! And to think that I should harbor such a rascal under my roof! I ought to put you out in the street, but I need the money, and times are hard. One thing I will do, though; I shall put myself under the protection of the constable. He lives next door, and you just try any of your nefarious practices on me, if you dare. You can stay here until your board money is worked out, unless they take you to jail in the meanwhile, which I trust and pray they will. But you can't stay with me one minute after your six weeks is up, even if they don't."

I went from her irate presence to my own room, and threw a hair brush at Jack's motto. It missed. Then I sought the telegraph office, and wrote out a telegram to Jack.

"That don't go through this office," said the telegraph operator. "You're sending that telegram to yourself and signing it with another man's name. It's against the rules to use the wires for criminal operations. O, we're onto you, young feller!"

I bit my lip and crossed the street to the cigar store. When I am in a predicament and studying my way out I like to chew an unlit cigar. The proprietor refused to sell me one.

"Money's too scarce in this region to take any risk on counterfeits. I suppose you've stuck me already, but if you have I'll have the law of you." I left him and sought the Postmistress pro tem once more. But learned that she had gone out walking. There was but one mail a day, and the post office closed at 2 P. M. I went to my room after that, and spent the rest of the day swearing at Jack's motto.

During the following week matters went from bad to worse. I left the house but once a day. The fact is, I had become conspicuous. I went to the post office once each day to expostulate with the Postmistress pro tem. When I did go grown people shunned me and little girls ran crying to their mothers. The small boys of the town, however, followed me around in a drove. But I went, nevertheless. The fact is, I had grown rather fond of expostulating with the pretty Postmistress. Shall I say that I had also grown rather fond of the Postmistress herself? Well, perhaps more than fond. But was a man ever so handicapped in his courting? She still insisted on calling me Mr. Dennett. I learned, though, that another letter had arrived for Mr. Wheaton, addressed in the same feminine hand, and many more in business envelopes. But not one would she deliver to me.

Disgusted at the absurd situation in which I was placed, and at my own unavailing efforts to extricate myself from it, I resolved one afternoon to vary the monotony of my disagreeable vacation by a walk in the woods. The course of my wanderings led me to the foot of a gnarled old tree whose huge limbs were but six or eight feet from the ground. I sat down at its base, reclining against it, and began studying the matter over. I have the habit of talking to myself when I am alone.

"Here I am," I mused, "without money enough to get home, and no possible chance of getting any unless I renounce my rightful name and tell them to send me money, using the name of Jack Dennett. But do I want to get home? No, not while that auburn haired Postmistress remains here. Here I am, and I have no idea whether I have been accepted by Miss Violet Pierson or not. But do I want to be accepted by Miss Violet Pierson? Decidedly not. Most assuredly not, if that auburn haired Postmistress is neither married nor engaged. Now, do I love that auburn haired Postmistress? I do, most pronouncedly. I love the ground she walks on, the stamps she sells, the pen she writes with, and, if I feel that way toward her I must love her sincerely, for she has got me into the worst mess of trouble I ever experienced in my life. But, under existing circumstances, I cannot even make love to her; I'm blessed if I'll court her under the name of Jack Dennett. Let Jack do his own courting. And she won't recognize me under any other name, nor could I entertain her if she did. I have money enough left to buy her two or three ice creams, but the ice cream man won't sell to me any more than the rest of them will. Of one thing, though, I am certain. I love her, and I'm going to marry her if I have to break Violet's heart, and—"

"Keep me up here all the rest of the afternoon listening to your nonsense?"

It was the voice of the Postmistress pro tem. I looked up. There she was seated on a low hanging branch of that self same tree. She had been reading a novel. She was blushing and laughing. And she was a very charming picture, too.

"I—I—I—beg your pardon," said I.

"Well, I think you ought to," she answered. "But you needn't be so afraid of breaking Violet's heart if you really are Mr. Frank Wheaton. See." She held up a large rectangular envelope. "It is the last letter for Mr. Wheaton from the girl in New York," she continued. "And she is either sending him her photograph, or she is sending his back to him. Undoubtedly the latter, as he has been such a poor correspondent. Oh!"

The letter dropped at my feet.

"Thank you," said I, tearing it open. "Do you carry the mail around with you on your rambles?"

"I do his mail," she answered, faintly, "for something told me, the very first day a letter came for him that—that I ought to be particularly careful of his mail. Perhaps I feared you would steal it, you know."

"Look," said I, not heeding her. The letter contained nothing but the photograph I had left with Violet as "Exhibit A." I handed it up to her. "Is that identification enough?"

"It certainly is."

"Permit me to introduce myself, then," said I, "Mr. Frank Wheaton, of St. Paul."

"I am Miss Frances Baring, of Albany," she replied. "And what an awful lot of trouble I've got you into. Here are the rest of your letters. I hope you will not report poor dear Uncle Ned."

"You overheard what I said when I was talking to myself?" I asked.

"Yes, I couldn't help it," she answered.

"Well, do you suppose I would do your uncle any harm under—under these circumstances?" She did not reply for a few moments. Then she said: "Do you think very much of her? Perhaps you are engaged to her?"

"Look!" said I. I took the bundle of letters and looked through them for the reply from Violet to my first letter. When I found it I held it up before the Postmistress pro tem and tore it, unopened, into small pieces, and flipped them to the breeze.

"Are you satisfied now?" I asked her.

I am not going to say what her reply was. But I'm glad I didn't smash Jack's motto. It hangs in our parlor to-day.—Truth.

Cutting Teeth at Eighty-three.

Two of the oldest men in Baltimore are now undergoing the suffering of cutting teeth.

One is Thomas R. Rich, aged seventy years, an accountant. Six years ago he was knocked down by a trolley car. His eye teeth were loosened and fell out. For six years he mourned their loss, and now he sheds tears at the arrival of their successors.

Two well-defined teeth have appeared in the place of the others, and the old man's jaws are so swollen that he can hardly eat.

The other aged tooth-cutter is William H. Hill. He is eighty-three years odl, and is suffering with a new wisdom tooth.

Mr. Hill is one of the oldest residents of South Baltimore, and a pensioned veteran of the Mexican war. During the Civil war he belonged to the Union League of Baltimore, and was a member of the party that helped dig a trench at Druid Hill Park for the reception of Harry Gilmore's band of Confederates who were expected to try and raid the city.

Mr. Hill had a narrow escape from being hanged in Northumberland county, Virginia, during the Rebellion by a band of young Southerners. They had collected a party of six Union sympathizers and had ropes about their necks. Hill was one of the party.

All were saved by the arrival of a big fellow named Jackson Walker, whose capture the Confederates were discussing. He made his appearance on the scene very suddenly. He was armed to the teeth, and, leaping into the crowd, quickly dispersed it, and the Union prisoners made their escape.

The old gentleman delights to tell this story, and declares that was the only time in his life that he ever felt as badly as he does now when cutting a wisdom tooth.

It may not be generally known, but the drawing of Du Maurier which claims the widest circulation is the label on the Appollinaris water bottles.

Pupils of the Annapolis (Md.) public schools have been notified that they will not be allowed to wear motto buttons in school.

Direct railway communication is to be shortly established between St. Petersburg, Russia, and Kieff, by way of Vitebsk.

Immense Fortune in Trees.

The timber wealth of the United States gives a yearly product of over a billion dollars, or twice the value of the entire output of all the mines put together—gold, silver, coal, iron, copper, zinc, and the rest. This is a resource worth keeping, and yet we are cutting into our capital at the fearful rate of 75 per cent. each year, as only about 25 per cent. of the timber market is represented by new growth. As for losses from the fires that are started by locomotives, cattlemen, berry pickers, hunters, and incendiaries, it gives a sufficient idea of what they cost us to be told by the Forestry Commissioner of Pennsylvania that his State alone probably suffers to the extent of $30,000,000 annually from this one cause. Not only the trees are lost in these mighty conflagrations; the vegetable mold which would supply fertility to the soil for future agricultural purposes or food for the roots of a second growth of forest is burnt, and the first step is taken on that easy descent to a landslide or a flood bed.

Emin Pasha's Daughter.

Emin Pasha's little daughter Ferida has been allowed by the German authorities to assume "Emin" as her family name. The is the offspring of a union between the well-known explorer Dr. Emin Schnitzer and an Abyssinian woman, Farfan, but in the pompous phraseology dear to the lawyer of the Vaterland the rectæ nuptiæ could not be clearly demonstrated and the name of Schuitzer could not therefore be assumed by the little lassie, who is said to be thriving in Berlin under kindly guardianship. Emin Pasha is understood to have left considerable property and on this ground, as well as others, it was thought right to settle "Ferrie's" legal status.

The Castor Oil Plant.

No sort of bird, beast or creeping thing will touch a castor oil plant It seems to be a rank poison to all the animal world. Even a goat will starve before biting off a leaf, and a horse will sniff at it and turn up his upper lip as though it had the most detestable odor on the face of the earth. Army worms and the locusts will pass it by, though they may eat every other green thing in sight; and there is no surer way to drive moles away from a lawn than to plant a few castor beans here and there. Even the tobacco worm will refuse to be fed on its leaves. There is hardly another instance in natural history of a plant being so universally detested by the animal world.

Empress Eugenie in Good Health.

The Empress Eugenie is now in better health than she has been for many years The rheumatic pain which she had in her right leg has almost entirely disappeared, and although she is still obliged to walk with a stick, she can take exercise for several hours every day without feeling much inconvenience. Her tall, graceful figure, her beautiful white hair, and her very distinguished features render her conspicuous wherever she goes, and it may be said with truth that, as an old lady, her appearance is quite as charming in its way as it was beautiful a quarter of a century ago.

Left Destitute!

Not of worldly goods, but of all earthly comfort, is the poor wretch tormented by malaria. The fell scourge is, however, shorn of its thong in advance by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, its only sure preventive and remedy. Dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, rheumatism, nervousness and kidney complaints are also among the bodily afflictions which this beneficent medicine overcomes with certainty. Use it systematically.

Hard Times in Deddville.

"Last Monday," writes the editor of the Deddville Recorder, "we went out to collect $160 due us on subscription from 160 delinquent subscribers. We put in the whole day at it. How much does the reader think we collected? Not a darned cent, reader; not a darned cent. We have been running a paper in this town seven years and we never saw times half as hard as they are now except the year we had triplets at our house."

Who, Indeed?

At one of the banquets of the coronation festivities at Morcow, in returning thanks for a toast proposed in his honor by Gen. de Boisdeffre, the French envoy, Gen. Dragomiroff, said: "We must love one another, for if we don't who the devil in Europe will?"

It is sometimes useful for housewives to know that a teaspoonful of cornstarch is equal to one egg, and may be substituted in case of a scarcity of eggs for part of the eggs in custards or other dishes where milk and eggs are called for.

Kentucky's Tobacco Yield.

Davis County is the banner tobacco county in Kentucky. Her product for 1895 is reported at 13,575,120 pounds. Graves County is a good second, with 12,416,000 pounds, and Henderson comes third, with 11,931,350. Hopkins County shows up with 9,103,000 pounds, with Webster close up to 8,285,966. When You See It in Print.

A sensitive man is never so humiliated as when he is obliged to read his own proofs. Type mocks the writer. The sentence that in manuscript moved, with the stride of an armed man or danced as a swooning strain of Strauss is now limp and lame. The phrase that glowed with color is now palid. Sparkling wit is flat; sage reflection is jejune. The thought, "Shall I ever get the money for this?" is jostled by "Who would be fool enough to pay for it?"—Boston Journal.

$100 Reward, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

The Sea Cucumber.

The sea cucumber, one of the curious jelly bodies that inhabit the ocean, can practically efface himself when in danger by squeezing the water out of his body and forcing himself into a narrow crack—so narrow as not to be visible to the naked eye. He can throw out nearly the whole of his inside, and yet live and grow again.

"I find that Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast Cocoa is absolutely pure. It contains no trace of any substance foreign to the pure roasted cocoa-bean. The color is that of pure cocoa; the flavor is natural, and not artificial; and the product is in every particular such as must have been produced from the pure cocoa-bean without the addition of any chemical, alkali, acid, or artificial flavoring substance, which are to be detected in cocoas prepared by the so-called 'Dutch process.'"

DeKalb Co. Institute

The following report is taken from the Inland Educator published at Terre Haute. Ind., of October. It is the leading educational journal of the Central West, and will give a good idea of how we stand up here:

DeKalb held its institute in the fine new opera house in Auburn, August 24. It was one of the old-time enthusiastic educational awakenings of the county, and was considered by many to have excelled, in interest at least, any previous effort, while the instruction was well up with the high standard maintained in that county for a number of years. Mrs. Emma Mont. McRae of the chair of literature, Purdue University, and Professor Chas. O. Merica of the chair of history and economics at Lawrence University, Appleton, Wis., were the regular daily instructors. Mrs. McRae, in her usual pleasant and attractive manner, discussed the subject of literature; while Professor Merica, by his deep insight into the subject, and his simple yet exact language, explained and simplified the supposed abstruse principles of educational psychology. Professor Norman W. Jones, one of DeKalb's former boys, now of the chair of literature in the Southwestern University, Winfield, Kansas, was present the entire week, and on Thursday gave the institute a most valuable hour in interpreting and impersonating Shakespeare's Hamlet. Louis D. Eichorn, Supervisor of music in the public schools of Logansport, was present three days, and while there had charge of the music. He also gave several very valuable talks on "Music in the Public Schools," and favored the institute with some of his excellent vocal solos. Besides an average daily attendance of over 165 teachers there were, as usual, 150 to 300 of the citizens of the town and county in constant attendance. This large attendance of citizens has for several years required the instructors to deviate largely from their usual professional work and give more of the culture side. In fact, the DeKalb County institutes do not aim at the academic; nor nearly so much at the professional as at social and culture phase of public education. With this end paramount, the "Annual Institute Lecture Course" is made a prominent and very popular feature, and the best popular lectures and entertainments in the country have been secured. This year on Monday evening there was a very fine musical concert, consisting of piano, vocal, violin, cornet and guitar solos by musicians of culture, training and ability. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings were filled by lectures respectively as follows: The Rev. Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Springfield, O.; Rev. Dr. A. W. Lamar of Galveston, Texas; Jahu DeWitt Miller of Philadelphia, Pa. Superintendent C. M. Merica, who is now serving his fourteenth year, is of course, the moving spirit; and to show their appreciation of his, valuable work, the institute on Wednesday, while one of the trustees had Mr. Merica out of the room on important(?) business, quickly raised the money and purchased, and had Mrs. McRae, on his return, in one of her characteristic veins of humor and eloquence, present to him a valuable gold watch and chain.

South Carolina Poplars.

Goshen Times.

The introduction of South Carolina poplar shade trees in Goshen has fairly commenced and in time no doubt they will be largely substituted for the native maple and elm.

D. W. Neidig has cut down the fine row of Catalpas around his residence on South Main street, and planted the South Carolina poplar in place of them. The catalpa is a fine tree, particularly when in bloom in the spring, but they are quite annoyance in dropping an immense amount of "bean pods" on the lawn.

The Sanders, Lesh & Egbert plat of ground is covered with 500 of the young popular.

FAULKNER'S TRIBUTE TO BRYAN.

Says That He Carried the Battle Nobly in Thirty States.

Washington, D. C., Nov. 5,—Senator Faulkner to-night said:

"Chairman Jones has informed me that he will this evening concede the election of Maj. McKinley. The confidence which Senator Jones has inspired and the manner in which he has conducted the campaign will warrant me in saying that none will question the propriety of his acting promptly in so gave a matter, when once he has become thoroughly satisfied from the returns in his possession that there remains no further hope for the success of that magnificent leader, whose plume has been seen in front of the line of battle in thirty states and whose eloquent voice in behalf of the people's cause his inspired millions of his fellow-citizens to strain every effort within the lines of legitimate controversy to secure a victory which would relieve them from the merciless exactions of a continuing contracting currency. The national democracy has been defeated, but from returns in our possession, and which we believe will be shown by the final vote in the electoral college twenty-six states, with 200 electoral votes, have indorsed its candidates and approved its platform. But, true to that great Jeffersonion principle, all must bow to the will of the people as voiced by a majority of the electoral college."

Two New Trains.

Auburn people are to be congratulated that they may leave town on the Wabash during day time after Nov. 15. The Wabash on that date put on two limited trains which will reach Auburn west bound at 11:50 and east bound at 12:50. Since the trains were taken off some months ago the road has not carried near so many passengers on account of the poor accomodations. These new trains will indeed be a great benefit to the cities and towns along this branch. Our people can then go east without getting up at 5 o'clock in the morning.

A Clever Swindler.

A clever swindler, says the Goshen News, has been rusticating among Elkhart people and in a small way successful. He goes under the name of Charles E. Steele and purported to be a heavy horse buyer. He got a rig of a livery man to be gone a few hours and is yet gone unless arrested, and when his affairs about town began to be investigated numerous little swindling tricks were found to his credit, none reaching over $20 and from that amount down to $5 among merchants and other people, including his landlady.

Human Freaks.

Noble County Has Four Very Unique Characters.

Lagrange, Nov. 8.—Noble county lays claim to having as citizens four unique characters. It has within its borders the smallest married couple in the United States and also the largest and smallest men from a physical standpoint in Indiana.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Shade, living in Kendallville, are the midget married couple. Both lack three inches of being three feet in hight, and have just passed the half-century mark. Mr. Shade has a luxuriant growth of hair and wears a heavy beard. He usually wears it in braids, often covering it with a net. Mrs. Shade is a few years the junior of her husband. Her former home was in New Haven. Conn. They were married several years ago.

George Washington Walker, also a resident of Noble county, is without doubt the heaviest man in Indiana, if not in the United States. He weighs 560 pounds, is now but forty-six years old and has been adding to his weight for the last quarter of a century. He is five feet ten inches in hight and is still growing. His waist measurement is seventy-six inches, chest under arms sixty-eight inches and arm twenty-five inches. He is in excellent, health but finds locomotion rather difficult, though he rides about the city in a specially constructed conveyance. He is the father of two bright and interesting children. In the heated season he lives almost entirely in the cellar of his residence.

Jesse Allen, his neighbor, who is nineteen years old, possesses a body of fair size, but his legs are only twelve inches in length. He is three feet three inches in hight and weighs seventy-five pounds.

Mrs. Boullion, 222 Crane St. Writes:

Dayton, O., March 12, '96.—'My baby is two months old and from her birth has had severe attacks of wind colic. I tried almost everything, but nothing gave her any relief until I got Dr. Hand's Colic Cure. I have used two bottles and would not do without it. It surely is the best colic medicine ever made." —If a man thinks he is going to get well, it will influence his health for the better. If the men who have locked up their money will think we shall have better times and let loose of some of these millions, puting some of their money in productive avocations, it will push it along. Let everybody try to bring better times by working for better times. In the improvements of the revival of business let us see that Auburn gets her share.

A Wife Equal to a Gold Mine!

Will some of your readers give me a good receipt for making a cold starch? I am selling self-heating flat irons and iron a little at every house and have to use some starch every place and want to know how to make a good cold starch. My husband was in debt and I being anxious to help him thought I would sell self-heating flat irons and I am doing splendidly. A cent's worth of fuel will even heat. You can iron in half the time and no danger of scorching the clothes as with the old iron, and you can get the most beautiful gloss. I sell at nearly every house, as the iron saves so much fuel, everybody wants one. I make $1.50 on each iron and have no gold less than ten any day I work. My brother is doing well and I think anyone can make lots of money anywhere selling irons. J F. CASEY & Co, St. Louis, Mo., will start anyone in the business, as they did me; if you will address them. MRS. A RUSSELL.

—So far as we have been able to find out but few silly election bets were made in Auburn. At least we have heard of none of our people rolling peanuts, wearing trousers wrong side out, walking barefoot, wheelbarrow riding and many other such bets. We have heard many say since the election that had they thought the result would have been so and so, they would have made some money betting. Men of neither party wanted to bet on the result in DeKalb county.

J. M. Robinson.

Remarkable Career of our Congressman-Elect.

The Indianapolis Sentinel contains the following complimentary notice of Hon. James M. Robinson, congressman-elect of this district:

"Congressman-elect J. M. Robinson, of this district, has indeed had a remarkable career. Commencing life on the streets of Ft. Wayne as a newsboy at the age of fifteen, in 1876 he began work in the shop as a machine hand, at that time supporting a widowed mother, for five years he labored in the shop, in the meantime studying law, and quitting his employment there in 1881, he began at once the practice of law at Fort Wayne. In 1888 he was unanimously nominated for prosecuting attorney and elected, running 700 votes ahead of the state ticket. After filling four years as prosecuting attorney, in 1892 he came within a few votes of receiving the nomination for congress in that district at the age of thirty. This year he was nominated without opposition for his first term, being the first time that this has occured in the history of the district. By running ahead of the presidential ticket in Fort Wayne nearly 600 votes, he is elected to congress by about 500 majority."

None Equal to Dr Hand's Says Mother.

Nelsonville, O., Dec. 20, '95—Dr. Hand—Dear Sir:—"I have been using your remedies for my children for over four years. I have used many other medicines but have found none equal to yours. Have recommended Dr. Hand's Colic Cure to many other mothers and persuaded them to try it; they all say it proves satisfactory. I am the mother of nine children and am never without a bottle of all of Dr. Hand's Remedies in the house." At Fischler & Son's 1

Quick Justice.

Wednesday night, some one stole two robes or blankets from Dora Duncan's barn up in Smithfield, and in the morning when he missed them, he began to investigate. There were late wagon tracks that gave the thing away, and he followed down in the direction of Auburn, and when a short distance this side of Waterloo, found the team where the parties had stopped to feed. He recognized the blankets and came on to Auburn, got the sheriff and had the men arrested. They were brought to Auburn, and arraigned before 'Squire Walter, who promptly fined them. Their fun cost about $20.

—The result of the election for president and congress is now definitely shown. William McKinley will be inaugurated president of the United States on the 4th of march next. Now that a decision which is beyond reversal has been reached, the party contention for this year is at an end, and it is the duty of every man whose emblem is the American flag to do all he can to uphold the new president, and to make his administration a success. This is the very essence of America citizenship. Each party in the presidential campaign promised better times as a result of its success. Only one could succeed and let nobody put obstructions in the path of the man who has been chosen as the executive head. Political contention cannot be avoided in this country, bnt there is no one who does not love a rest from it. Now is a good time for repose without idleness. Let us all pull together for good times, If Mr. McKinley does well let us help him for the country's sake. If he does not, we will have another chance at him.

Wednesday's Daily.

Court.

As soon as the Webster case was out of the way, the case, of Luce vs Gingrich came up. This is a case from Waterloo in which Luce sues Gingrich for alienating the affections of his, Luce's wife. It promises to be a very attractive case, if we judge by the number of spectators who fill the court room. Rose and Leas are attorneys for Luce, and Phillips for the defense. It will likely last a day or two.

Friday's Daily.

The case of Luce vs Gingrich yesterday for alienating the affections of Mrs. Luce, resulted in favor of the plaintiff. The jury gave Luce $35. Just how a jury gets at the value of these things we don't know, especially when one of their number is an old bachelor like Will Chambers. It is a base slander on Will, however, to claim that his figures [illegible] 27. There are several tender hearted men on that jury, that we could name, but all are bigger than we are.

After the Luce case was done, the Gardner case from this township was called up again. This is a case involving the title to some land, we believe and at present it looks as if it would take a day or so. A great deal of other business has come up and been finished, that we have not had time to note. To-day sheriff Stroh went to Michigan City with Webster and another prisoner.

Saturday's Daily.

The Joseph Gardner case we spoke of yesterday, went in favor of Gardner, it being the opinion of the jury that he was was still entitled to possession of the land. To-day, Hon. D. R. Best, of Angola has charge of a case in which Frank Stafford and wife are on one side and W. Franks is on the other. It is a dispute of about the possession of some property. The jury have gone home till Monday.

Soulless or Brainless

The Dispatch in putting in the notice of the new train on the Wabash road says:

"The Wabash company had concluded that if McKinley was elected, they would put on two additional trains. That result having been reached, the trains will soon be running. Had Bryan been elected, these trains would have remained in "inoxuous desuetude."

We can forgive them for the way they spell "innocuous," but for the silliness of the statement there is no excuse. The facts are the Wabash found it made a mistake when it took those two trains off, for the Lake Shore at once changed its train, so that passengers could come from Butler via Waterloo to Auburn and return in less time and at the same price, and so got all the patronage. Now the Wabash finds itself compelled to change back, and get its old trains on again. It simply rectifies a business mistake. If we thought the railroad itself gave the reason published in the Dispatch, we would be forced to conclude that corporations were not only "soulless," but brainless.

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa, and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf

—The kind of a campaign that everybody should enter upon, wisely suggests the South Bend Times, is a campaign for making business lively and profitable, for securing remunerative employment to labor and for securing general prosperity to the 70,000,000 inhabitants of this great country.

—They tell a good joke on the south precinct of Jackson at the election. The big ballots filled the box by noon, and they had to go and get a drygoods box to use for the rest of the day. It may have been a little irregular, but it could not be avoided, and besides, the ballots were honestly cast and honestly counted, and that is all anyone can ask.

Did You Ever Make Money Easy.

MR. EDITOR.—I have read how Mr. C. B. made so much money in the Dish Washer business and think I have beat him. I am very young yet and have had little experience in selling goods, but have made over eight hundred dollars in ten weeks selling Dish Washers. It is simply wonderful how easy it is to sell them. All you have to do is to show the ladies how they work and they cannot help but buy one. For the benefit of others I will state that I got my start from the Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write to them and they will send you full particulars.

I think I can clear over $3,000 the coming year, and I am not going to let the opportunity pass. Try it and publish your success for the benefit of others. J. F. C, 1

Characteristic of the Man.

Many an act of kindness has been left undone because it carried with it a possible loss of dignity. The following letter of a lady of Springfield, Ill., published in McClure's Magazine, shows the self-forgetfulness and kindness of the great man we all delight to honor. The incident took place after Mr. Lincoln had been to Congress. We might query how many representatives of two hundred and fifty thousand men would forget themselves enough to do the same thing.

"The very children," the lady writes, "knew him, for there was not one of them for whom he had not done some kind deed. My first impression of Mr. Lincoln was made by one of his kind deeds. I was going with a little friend for my first trip alone on the railroad cars. It was an epoch of my life. I had planned for it and dreamed of it for weeks.

"The day came, but as the hour of the train approached the hackman, through some neglect, failed to call for my trunk. As the minutes went on I realized, in a panic of grief, that I should miss the train. I was standing by the gate, my hat and gloves on, sobbing as if my heart would break, when Mr. Lincoln came by.

"'Why, what's the matter?' he asked, and I poured out all my story.

"'How big's the trunk? There's still time, if it isn't too big,' and he pushed through the gate and up to the door.

"My mother and I took him up to my room, where my little old-fashioned trunk stood, locked and tied. 'Oh, ho!' he cried. 'Wipe your eyes and come on quick.'

"And before I knew what he was going to do, he had shouldered the trunk, was down stairs, and striding out of the yard. Down the street he went as fast as his long legs could carry him, I trotting behind, drying my tears as I went. We reached the station in time. Mr. Lincoln put me on the train, kissed me good-by, and told me to have a good time. It was just like him."

HOW OUR PINS ARE MADE.

Much Labor Is Required to Prepare the Little Stickers for Market.

To complete a pin it has to go through many hands. It is a very delicate article to handle, and the cost of building the machines to make it is the greatest outlay. The wire from which pins are manufactured is specially prepared and comes to the factory on large reels very much like gigantic cotton spools. The wire is first turned through eight or ten little copper rollers. This is to get all the bend and kink out of it; in other words, to straighten it perfectly. After this operation it is once more wound on a very large reel, which is attached to the machine that makes the pins. One of these machines makes 8,000 pins an hour, and some large factories will often have thirty or forty machines at work at one time. After the pins are released from the grip of this machine they are given a bath of sulphuric acid. This removes all the grease and the dirt from them.

Then they are placed in a tub or barrel of sawdust. Pins and sawdust are next taken together from the barrel and allowed to fall in a steady stream through a strong air blast, which separates the sawdust from the pins. But as yet they are pointless, and pins without points would not be of much use. In order to point them they are carried on an endless grooved belt, which passes a set of rapidly moving files. This points them roughly, and after being passed between two grinding wheels and forced against a rapidly moving band faced with emery cloth they are dipped in a polishing tub of oil. This latter is a large, slowly revolving copper-lined tub, which is tilted at an agle of about 45 degrees. As this revolves the points keep sliding down the smooth copper to the lower side, and owing to the constant friction against the copper and each other receive a brilliant polish and finish.

They go next to the sticker, where they fall from a hopper on an inclined plane, in which are a number of slits. The pins catch in these slits and, hanging by their heads, slide down into an apparatus which inserts them in the paper. This machine is perhaps the most ingenious of all the beautiful and complicated contrivances that help to make and manipulate the pin. It does all this at the rate of 100,000 pins an hour, and yet a single bent or damaged pin will cause it to stop feeding until the attendant removes the offender.—Dry Goods Economist.

Livingstone's Boyhood.

Janet Livingstone, who died recently in Edinburgh, was the younger sister of the great African explorer, David Livingstone. She told many quaint stories of her brother's boyhood. Once when six years old he stayed out beyond the prescribed hours, and on returning home found the door barred, a punishment for the second transgression of the kind. David made no fuss, and his father, when he opened the door some time later, found the young hopeful sitting on the door step munching a penny loaf.

"I'm having my supper," he observed resignedly to his astonished parent. "Mother has shut me out."

Livingstone, senior, was as great a philosopher as his son. One day David brought home the news that a heavy duty was to be put on tobacco.

Neil Livingstone, who was not a rich man, was just lighting his pipe as the news was broken. He put it down unlighted.

"If we have to give it up," he said, "we may as well begin now." He never smoked again.

THANKSGIVING AT HOME.

O, it's early in the mornin' that a feller must be risin,'
Thanksgivin' Day, like Christmas time, it comes but wunst a year.
The birds are stuffed an' roastin' with an odor appetizin'.
The pumpkin pies are bakin' an' the cider flowin' freer
There's pies an' piles o' cookies, an' there's doughnuts till you're diggy,
There's mounds an' mounds of jelly, an' there's biscuits browned an' light.
All the mornin' in the kitchen mother's been most awful busy,
O, you bet I'm mighty thankful that I own an appetite.

Two lonely, solemn turkeys, sole survivors of the flock,
Are a-strattin' round the yard with a kind o' anxious air.
The sort o' sudden absence of their friends 's quite a shock,
An' they're searchin' fer their late lamented cronies everywhere.
With spreadin' tails and feathers fluffed their quest they keep pursuin';
They don't suspect their fate will be the others' gloomy lot.
They notice how we're fussin' an' they wonder what we're doin'.
O, you bet I'm mighty thankful that a turkey I am not.

The folks they keep arrivin' brimmin' o'er with fun an' laughter,
Bluff uncles shake my hand until the bones begin to crack.
Girl cousins shyly kiss me—jes' exactly what I'm after—
An' with prompt'tude quite lightning-like I gayly kiss 'em back.
But one of them, the fairest maid of all my fair relations,
To steal my heart by witchin' arts somehow she does contrive,
While in her eyes I read a tale beyond my expectations
O, you bet I'm mighty thankful—mighty thankful—I'm alive.

HE was not a bad man at heart. But the very qualities which moved some people to call him a "jolly good fellow" were identical with those which made other people consider him a bad citizen, and, with the usual emphasis of people who take the downward view, a very bad citizen.

When his wife died he seemed to awake with a sudden shock to the issues of life and the fact of death. He had loved her with all that marvelous depth of tenderness, that inconsistent fervor which sometimes underlies the weakest natures.

In the newness of his grief he foreswore his old ways and habits. He knew himself to be weak. He fancied the way to strength of resistance lay along the road of self-exile to strange scenes and unfamiliar faces—that road well worn by the restless feet of those who fly from the battle within to wage an unequal struggle with the allies without.

He left his little son, made doubly dear to him by the sense of loss, with his wife's cousin, gave to her what money he could spare for the child's support, promised to send more at regular intervals, and departed westward.

* * * * * * * *

More than a year later he roused himself as if the finger of fate had touched him. He remembered, with an anguished regret, that he had failed again; that for months he had drifted from place to place, he himself scarcely knew where or how. He remembered that his promised remittances for the boy had ceased. He saw himself broken in strength, in health, in spirit. He felt suddenly overpowered with the consciousness of his own weakness, and, as a drowning man's arms reach wildly out toward any illusion of help, his thought went out toward his child.

It seemed to him that the love of his boy could save him. The miracle of salvation became to him possible, wherein a little child, strong in love and innocence and faith, should lift the fainting, falling manhood of the man.

A passionate yearning seized him to fold again to his heart the little form, to feel about his neck the clinging arms, to hear again the lisping words which came to his weakened memory like distant echoes in a dream. And then he remembered the day when first the child was laid in his arms; he remembered the thrill, the wonder, the first pride of fatherhood. Then, in broken glimpses, as a fair landscape is seen between blurs of mist, there came to him memories in swift succession, of the growth, the incidents of the child's few years.

"I must go to him," whispered the man with a gasp, as he lifted his head from his hands. His face was flushed, tears stood in his eyes. His resolution was carried out with feverish haste, and he turned his face to the East.

* * * * * * * *

His wife's relative had little excuse for him. She had long considered him a hopeless vagabond. So when he appeared suddenly, as from the possible, and, in her opinion, better, dead, she was not prepared to receive him with especial cordiality. The story was soon told. The boy had died months before. He slept by his mother. No one had known where to address the father, who was supposed to have forgotten he had a son. She was really not much surprised at the apathy with which the father listened. It was consistent with her estimate of his character. She had no means of knowing that his faculties were stunned. But she was astonished beyond measure when, in a mechanical way, he insisted upon giving her money for the expense of caring for and burying the boy.

"Is that quite all?" he kept asking, and then, abruptly but quickly, he said: "Good-by, I'm going back."

He knew that his hope was dead; he felt the certainty of fall now that nothing remained to him to lean upon. But he thought of other things.

A sleety mist filled the air, sparkling in the street lights like a mazy shower of brilliants. The particles stung his face like elfin arrows. His features were tense and rigid. His eyes were hot and dry and his head ached with a dull, insistent, maddening pain. He passed the colored globes of a drug store and stopped. Red, violet, and green the shafts of light pierced the dark. The people about him seemed shadows, the sound of their voices leagues away. Dimly he remembered a prescription for an opiate he had used for headaches like that. Fumbling in his pockets he found the paper and entered the store.

"Make twice the number of powders," he said to the clerk. "I don't want to bother getting the stuff so often."

The clerk hesitated.

"Nonsense," said the man. "I'm perfectly familiar with the use of it. Give me one of them now with a glass of water."

Then he went into the street again with the packet of powders in his pocket, and already the mere taking of the drug had somewhat soothed him. He felt hushed; his mind seemed to clear and lift itself into a curious, impersonal attitude. As he walked he found himself quite willing to contemplate calmly the sodden pain at his heart, the utter hopelessness and uselessness of his life. With a mocking persistence the many resolves he had made to himself, the efforts to change, the ever-succeeding failure surged up before him, and his lip curled in contemptuous scorn of himself. Never did a man hold himself up to more merciless scrutiny, more intolerant judgment.

In his abstraction he nearly fell upon a group of wretched children of the street who stood clustered about a restaurant window.

And such a window! The light of mellow globes flooded it. It was decked with holiday greens. In the center, on a platter sprigged with parsley, reposed brown and crisp, a roasted pig, with the reddest of apples in its mouth. On each side a fair, fat turkey, dressed for the oven, lay in state. Lobsters, in their scarlet coats, brown quail with heads tucked under their wings to swell out the pitiful little breasts, and divers other resources and accessories of the culinary art lent color and suggestiveness to the tableau.

The man stopped. A tiny fellow, about as large as his own boy would have been, but ragged and dirty and shivering, as by God's mercy his own never would be, lifted a newspaper up to him and piped in a shrill little voice:

"Buy a paper, mister, to help me git a T'anksgivin' dinner!

"Is this Thanksgiving?" asked the man with a dull surprise.

"Sure!" said the boy. "Don't y' see dat lay-out in de winder?"

The man looked at the window. He had not noticed it before. He stared at the children. He put his hand in his trousers pocket and felt the small roll of bills he knew was there. He remembered approximately the amount. Brushing past the pleading child at his feet, he went abruptly into the restaurant. After a brief interview with the manager he returned to the door.

"Who wants a Thanksgiving dinner?" he asked. Two or three voices said "Me!" explosively, but for the rest an incredulous stare alone responded, until one boy said, slowly and reproachfully: "Ah-h, g'way! You're givin' us guff!"

For answer the man opened the door, and the children, without more ado, clumsily shuffled past him. All save one, a girl with an accordion slung from her shoulder and the black locks of Italy straying from under the red kerchief on her head. She paused with a look of inquiry.

"Does de girl come?" asked a boy. "She's a purty good feller—for a girl."

"Yes, come along," said the man, with an affectation of cheerfulness. "In a time like this female suffrage goes."

They were led by a grinning waiter to a private dining-room where a long table stood shrouded as with new-fallen snow; and while the children were taken to wash their hands and faces, the man, whose head throbbed afresh as he came in from the outer air, took in a glass of brandy two of the powders from the package in his pocket.

"Bring us a real old Thanksgiving dinner," he said to the waiter, "and plenty of it, without too many frills. Some soup and—some turkey——" He paused and looked archly at the children, who caught the spirit of his glance and shouted: "Yes, yes!"

"Yes, some turkey with cranberry sauce——"

The tiny newsboy hugged himself and murmured: "Cramb'ry sauce!"

"And some scalloped oysters," continued the man, stopping after the mention of each delicacy to watch the children, who shivered with eagerness and punctuated each pause with approving nods and murmuring echoes, "and some sweet potatoes, and plenty of bread and butter, and—ah, pickles——"

"Ah-h, pickles!" repeated the children.

"And pie—shall it be mince pie or apple pie?" he asked.

This question required pondering, and a youthful Alexander cut the Gordian knot by saying: "Le's have bofe."

"Here, here," said the man to a boy who scrambled for the seat at his right hand. "When there's only one lady in the company the seat of honor should belong to her."

The man touched her hand reassuringly and turned to his left, where sat the little newsboy. Long and steadily he looked into the child's face.

"He, too, had blue eyes," he murmured, with a catch of the breath as for a brief instant his own eyelids closed and he bit his lip.

When the soup was served—"Wait a moment," he said. He had a vague notion that some sort of grace ought to be asked. Swiftly his thoughts flew back to the New England home of his boyhood. He remembered the bowed head of his mother and the subdued voice of his gray-haired father asking the divine blessing. Oddly enough, he remembered, too, how he used to kick under the table at his brother to make him laugh. Somewhat unsteadily he rose and leaned heavily upon the table. A strange giddiness was creeping upon him which required all his will to resist.

"Lord bless us, and make us——"

His mind wandered, he could not think of the next word. It seemed to him he had no right to address the Deity—what, he! It was absurd! And while he hesitated two of the children, thinking the benediction done, cried out, "Amen!" and fell to eating their soup with a clatter of spoon and dish and divers other noises of the mouth not heard in polite society.

What if some of them put their plates up to their lips to drain the last drops; what if some of them ate with their fingers and surreptitiously stole choice bits from their neighbor's dishes; what if there arose occasional outcries and incipient riots which the bewildered waiters promptly quelled! In spite of these things the dinner was a complete success from the standard of its purpose.

Never were guests more appreciatively hungry; never was host more careful to supply his guests, though it must be confessed he himself ate little, and as the dinner progressed his eyes grew dull, and from time to time his head drooped slowly forward till he caught himself like one fighting against an overwhelming drowsiness.

At last, when each child had eaten two pieces of pie, even to the last crumb, the man rose to his feet, clutching at his chair for support. He brushed his hand across his eyes. Strange lights danced before him, crimson and gold; the air was populous with unknown shapes, weaving in slow mazes; soft melodies sang in his ears as from infinite distances, thrilling, uncertain, rising and falling as with the swell of an invisible sea.

"Children," his own voice sounded remote and dissevered from his, "good-night. Have you had a good dinner?"

The vociferous assent recalled his straying fancies. He saw his guests multiplied as in a room walled with mirrors.

Being of unceremonious habit, they stood not upon the order of their going and soon were gone. As the little newsboy slid down from his chair the man laid a hand on the child's tangled head and gazed in his face with a look of yearning tenderness. The boy looked startled and hurried away.

"It was a great success," said the man to the waiter as he laid a bill on the cashier's tray. He uttered his words with hesitating precision.

"It—is—the—only—good—thing—I—ever—did—in—my—life," and then he laughed aloud.

The waiter smiled complaisantly; the tip was large enough to cover many eccentricities.

"Bring me a bottle of brandy, some cigars, and an evening paper," said the man, still in the same measured tone. "I will ring when I want anything more," he concluded, and the waiter withdrew.

Nearly an hour later he cautiously opened the door and peeped in.

"Did you ring, sir?" he asked diplomatically. There was no response, and he went swiftly to the averted chair. On the table the cigars were untouched; one glass of brandy had been taken from the bottle; several small white paper wrappers lay on the cloth beside the emptied glass. In the chair, with his hands still holding the paper and his head against the high leather back, sat the man—but his spirit had gone too far on a long quest to be recalled.

The Crowning of the Year.

This is the festival which the Pilgrim fathers inaugurated, which New England has annually celebrated for two centuries, and which the nation has adopted and sanctioned as a day of public thanksgiving to God. It exalts the home and strengthens its sacred and tender ties. It brightens the shadows which have gathered over it. It dignifies prosperity. It prompts men to reach out helpful hands to their less fortunate neighbors. It reminds us afresh from whence every good gift comes. If it seemed good to our fathers in the midst of the hardships of this new world to give public thanks to God for blessings, how much more reason have we to follow their example? Abundance of food and clothing, happy homes, a free country at peace with all nations and extending its influence throughout the world, with marvelously multiplied appliances for use and pleasure which surpass the wildest dreams of those who first were moved to set apart a day of public thanksgiving and praise, are ours. What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord.

WHICH?

"LE'S HAVE BOFE."

"DID YOU RING, SIR?"

THANKSGIVING DAY IN EUROPE.

Baked Beans, Glace, and "Bounkin Pie a l'Americaine."

A few years ago one of the diplomatic corps in Paris complimented some American visitors by giving a Thanksgiving dinner. He made some elaborate researches regarding our national customs as applied to the day and with help of his chef offered among other things baked beans, well thinned with custard and frozen. The crowning glory of the feast was a pumpkin pie. Its crust was shingly puff paste fully an inch thick. The pumpkin was merely a filmy glaze upon the paste, with a taffy-like consistency that made it cling to the eater's teeth.

The chef must have imparted the secret to the national pie, at least in part, to others of his craft, for a little later a well-known restaurateur announced on a little placard at his establishment: "Bounkin Pie a la Americaine."

In Berlin the traveler will find, if he is there in November, an addition to the menu of some places of refreshment. The addition is a flourishing announcement to Americans that Indian puddings, bean puddings, pumpkin tarts, and other delicacies, which the waiter will affably say are for the American "Danksgiving," but which only resemble the originals they imitate as the mist resembles the rain.

Foreign restaurants pride themselves upon catering to American customers' tastes, but their translations are striking and worked out laboriously from the dictionary. One Berlin hotel proudly put upon the menu, "False hair stewed American fashion." It requires some penetration to discover that a dish of smothered beef known to us as mock rabbit is meant.

A Russian of wealth and position having gathered accurate knowledge of Indian corn and the ways it should be served some years ago, invited some English and American friends to dinner and, after a little preliminary boast of the success his gardner had made in cultivating the vegetable, presented his guests with tiny immature cobs an inch and a half long, boiled till tender and served like asparagus tips with a rich cream dressing. An American present found it difficult to maintain a circumspect gravity when the hostess asked him if it was true that in America this corn was always eaten with the fingers, for in view of the dripping ears she was daintily lifting, one at a time, upon her fork, he had to assure her that she was eating it in the only proper manner.

Tickletooth Pudding.

"Tickletooth pudding" was the name of the Thanksgiving pudding of old colonial days. It was only a memory of the great progenitor of that name which the pilgrims had left at home in old England. There were no ten pounds of solid fruit, no twenty luscious eggs, rich beef suet, nor was it dampened with choice brandy and home-brewed ale. But it was probably more easily digested.

Every Day

Every day is a day of thanksgiving for Christians. They do not wait until the crops have been gathered before returning thanks, for they are thankful for every day's blessing. Still it is a commendable custom for a nation to officially recognize man's dependence, and to ask its people to unite in a common thanksgiving.

Not Needed.

"Well, Thanksgiving is enough for me without medicines."

A RACE FOR A GIRDLE.

The Contest Between the Overland Telegraph and the Atlantic Cable.

The race-course was between the Old World and the New. The racers were telegraph companies. One was called the "Russian Overland"; the other the "Atlantic Cable."

The track of the Russian lay between New Westminster in British Columbia, and Moscow. Up through the unexplored Fraser River Valley it was to run, then on through the untracked wilderness of Alaska, across Behring Strait, over the timberless steppes of Arctic Siberia, and along the dreary coast of the Okhotsk Sea to the mouth of the Amoor. There the American racers, called "Western Union," were to give over the race to the Russian telegraph department, which was to make its best time in reaching Moscow.

Western Union said it would cover the ground in about two years. The cost would be about five millions of dollars; but what was five millions of dollars if the prize could be won—an electric girdle for the earth?

The path of the "Atlantic" cable was to be on a tableland some two miles deep in the ocean, reaching from Ireland to Newfoundland.

The summer of 1865 found the world watching this race with great interest. It opened when the fleet of the Russian expedition set sail from San Francisco, northward bound. The "Atlantic" people at the same time were stowing away gigantic coils of cable into the capacious hold of the "Great Eastern"—a new cable some two thousand miles long.

The Western Union directors were shrewd business men. Five millions of dollars was little in comparison with the benefit they would receive could they get telegraphic communication with Europe, and they then believed that the only way was by land. The public agreed with them nearly unanimously. And so the two projects—the overland and the submarine—were pitted against each other.

A very unequal race it seemed at the outset. The Overland was strong and vigorous, the Atlantic was broken by former failures. The Overland was popular, and had plenty of money back of it; the Atlantic was derided, and "only fools," it was said, "would invest in it."

The fleet of the Russian Expedition which sailed from San Francisco in the summer of 1865 was quite a navy. There were ocean steamers, sailing-vessels, coast and river boats, and Russian and American ships of the line, with a promise of a vessel from her Majesty's navy. The expedition was well officered, and about 120 men were enlisted—men of superior ability in every department. The supplies embraced everything that could be needed. Thousands of tons of wire, some 300 miles of cable, insulators, wagons, etc.

August 26, 1866, the Great Eastern landed its cable at Trinity Bay and the whole world was electrified by the news that it worked perfectly—that the victory had been won. More than that, The Great Eastern, not long afterward picked up the cable lost the year before, and that too, was soon in working order. Two electric girdles had been clasped around the earth.

The success of the "Atlantic" was defeat for the "Russian." An overland telegraph line could never compete with the submarine cables. The first triumphant "click, click!" at Trinity Bay was therefore the death-blow of the Russian scheme, and all work connected with that project was at once abandoned.

But the workers—the brave men facing famine among the wild Chookchees—buried in their lonely huts waiting for some news from their comrades, or straining every nerve to complete their share of the great work—how pathetic that so many of them did not hear what had happened in some cases for more than a year after the success of the cable!—St. Nicholas.

What a Big Gun Can Do.

Major-General Ruger has approved for the use of the United States army a table for the twelve-inch breech-loading rifles prepared by Lieutenant Colonel John I. Rodgers, Second Artillery, which has a popular interest in showing the enormous power of these huge weapons, with which forts of our principal harbors are protected. With the standard charge of 450 pounds of brown prismatic powder the 1,000 pound projectile leaves the gun with a muzzle velocity of 2,000 feet per second. On a range of one mile the gun requires an elevation of about one degree. The projectile reaches the target in approximately two and a half seconds, with a striking velocity of 1,823 feet per second, and at that point can be relied upon to penetrate 22½ inches of steel. On a two-mile range the gun elevation would be nearly three degrees, the time of flight a little less than six seconds, the striking velocity 1,650 feet per second, and the penetration in steel 19 inches. At five miles the elevation of the gun's muzzle is nearly nine degrees, the time of flight 17 seconds, and with a striking velocity of 1250 feet per second, 14 inches of steel would be penetrated. The shot would take 26 seconds to travel seven miles, and would then perforate a ship armored with 12 inches of steel.

Clouds Bring Out Odors.

A garden full of flowers is more fragrant when shadowed by a cloud than when bathed in sunshine; at least, that is the conclusion to which the recent experiences of M. Mesnard lead. He asserts that it is light, and not, as commonly believed, oxygen, which exerts the greatest influence in destroying odors. According to the same authority, the intensity of the perfume given off by a flower depends upon the reaction between the pressure of water in the cells of the plant, which tends to drive out the essential oils that carry the odor, and the action of the sunlight which tends to diminish the water pressure in the cells. Sprinkling a plant increases the turgescence in the cells, and so augments the perfume. A cloud passing over the sun arrests the action of the light, thus permitting an increase of turgescence, and, as a consequence, a more copious production of perfume. At night the air around a flower bed is heavy with odors, because then their emanations are not tossed by the zephyrs.

How foolish it is, then, to expect a cure from snuffs, inhalants, etc. The sensible course is to purify your blood by taking the best blood purifier, Hood's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has permanently cured Catarrh in a multitude of cases. It goes to the root of the trouble, which is impure blood. Remember

A Novel Diet.

The following by Rev. R. C. Barr, a reputable writer, is from the North British Monthly Register, for March, 1760: Early this year (1760 there was brought to Avignon a true lithophagus, one stone eater. He not only swallowed flints an inch long and a half an inch thick, but such other stones as he could reduce to powder with his teeth, such as common pebbles, gravel, sand, etc. The softer stones he chewed with his teeth until they were reduced to a sort of paste, which seemed very agreeable to this queer creature's digestive apparatus. * * * His saliva was very corrosive, so much so that scrubbing compounds would not clean the spots which were made by his spitting on the iron floor.

THE BLUES.

A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF THE DREADFUL FEELING.

What Is Meant by This Form of Acute Misery—Where Doctors Make Mistakes.

When a cheerful, brave, light-hearted woman is suddenly plunged into that perfection of misery, the BLUES, it is a sad picture.

It is usually this way:—

She has been feeling "out of sorts" for some time; head has ached, and back also; has slept poorly; been quite nervous, and nearly fainted once or twice; head dizzy, and heart has beat very fast; then that bearing-down feeling. Her doctor says, "cheer up, you have dyspepsia; you'll be all right soon."

But she doesn't get "all right." She grows worse day by day, till all at once she realizes that a distressing female complaint is established.

Her doctor has made a mistake.

She has lost faith in him; hope vanishes; then comes the brooding, morbid, melancholy, everlasting BLUES. Her doctor, if he knew, should have told her and cured her, but he did not, and she was allowed to suffer. By chance she came across one of Mrs. Pinkham's books, and in it she found her very symptoms described and an explanation of what they meant. Then she wrote to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., for advice, feeling that she was telling her troubles to a woman. Speedy relief followed, and vigorous health returned.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound instantly asserts its curative powers in all those peculiar ailments of women. It has been the standby of intelligent American women for twenty years, and the story recited above is the true experience of hundreds of women, whose letters of gratitude are to be found on file in Mrs. Pinkham's library.

RAPID SCENE SHIFTING.

The Latest Mechanical Effects in a European Theater.

It is a remarkable fact that when an audience has become interested in the plot and progress of a play the interruptions necessary for the change of scenery seem to be much longer than they really are. A wait of five minutes is amply sufficient to send the impatient male American out "to see a man" and set the ladies' fans in active motion. In France the scenes are changed almost instantly.

The French system is distinguished by the use of masts upon carriages running in grooves or slots in the stage, the scenery being adjusted to the movable mast so as to be rolled on to its exact position. One scene is attached to its masts while another is being played. At the close of the scene the rideau de nouages, or cloud curtain, is used. This consists of two curtains painted as clouds, one descending, the other ascending from a slot in the stage, after the ancient Roman method. The moment the bottom curtain has risen sufficiently to hide the audience the employes beneath the stage run off the carriages of the past scene and on the new. This is so quick that it is done by the time the ascending and descending curtains have met, and their course is immediately reversed, disclosing the new scene, in the space of a few seconds. The English and American method of quick changes is clumsy compared to it.

The most recent, and in more than one sense revolutionary, is the invention of Karl Lautenschlage, the master machinist of the Residenz-Hof Theater, Munich. The entire stage is a turntable, such, indeed, as we may see at any locomotive shed on the railway. The proscenium opening, about 35 feet, dominates one-fourth of the periphery, and the stage can be arranged to hold from one to four scenes according to desire. The motive power used is electricity. The stage was used for the first time last May in a production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni." The accompanying illustration shows the entire arrangement, one side of the proscenium being supposed to be cut away, showing the garden scene ready to swing round into position as soon as the ballroom scene is finished.

Another method is that in use in the theater at Budapest and some others in Europe, where scenes can be set to come up through slots in the stage, while the previous scene is sinking through similar openings.

REVOLVING STAGE AT THE KING'S THEATER, MUNICH.

All Manner.

Sometimes there is very little in matter and almost everything in manner. Harper's Drawer tells of an irascible German father who angrily waved a telegram in the face of his meeker wife, and said:

"Listen to the tone in which that rascal of a son speaks to his father! The impertinent spendthrift! 'Father, send me money! Hannes.' Now, what do you say to such barefaced impudence? Spending money, and then giving his father peremptory orders to send more?"

"But he does not say that, my dear husband," replied the mother, taking the telegram in her turn. "Listen, this is what he writes" and with soft, pleading, ingratiating voice she read, "Father! Send me money. Hannes." When she came to the boy's name, there were tears in her voice.

"If only he had written that!" said the father, and he was almost persuaded to pity.

FAMOUS HETTY GREEN.

How a Street Gamin Got the Best of Her in a Financial Transaction.

Hetty Green, the wealthiest woman in the world, stopped at a Washington hotel a few days ago, says an exchange. She did not register and the clerks had orders to conceal the fact of her presence. An amusing incident occurred during the millionairess' visit to Washington. She brought with her to the hotel a canary. The old lady was passionately fond of the bird, and when it escaped from the room one day she was grief stricken. In her sorrow and excitement she made a wild offer of $5 to the bellboy who would find her pet. The neighborhood was scoured by the buttoned gentry and, their search being unsuccessful, they tried several "ringers" on the old lady. But she knew her bird and refused to be duped. The canary was finally found by a small freckle-faced newsboy. He carried it up to Mrs. Green, who went into an ecstasy of joy. The boy had placed the bird in a small wooden cage, which he clutched firmly in a very dirty hand. "Give me the cage, my little man," said Mrs. Green. "Gimme de dough," retorted the unabashed boy. Mrs. Green told him she would willingly give the dollar she had promised. "Say," replied the gamin, "you take me fer a good t'ing. I ain't.

HETTY GREEN.

Youse promised five; and five I gits, or I'll wring the stiff's choker," and the boy made a villainous move toward the bird, which chirruped feebly. This was too much for Mrs. Green. She hastily pulled out a bill with Gen. Grant's vignette on it and exclaimed: "You little scoundrel, now will you hand me that cage?"

"Gimme one hand on dat bill," sullenly said the boy.

"And you give me one hand on that cage," hissed Mrs. Green. This strangely assorted pair advanced cautiously toward each other, and in that fashion exchanged cage and bill. The boy gave a whoop of joy as he slid down the banisters.

A WIDESPREAD MALADY.

How Malaria Starts, Develops, Kills and Is Killed.

Malaria is essentially the disease of spring and autumn, and among all the infectious diseases it is geographically the most widespread. It is a disease of the tropics as well as the temperate zone, being entirely absent in the frigid zone.

The malarial bacillus, the prime cause of the malaria plasmodium, lives in the soil, and may be taken into the system through contaminated water, the atmosphere, an open surface, or in any other way by which germs make their entrance into the human body. Once there, the malaria plasmodium, as the germ is called after it has entered the blood, begins its destructive work in the blood cells, poisoning the blood often to an alarming extent. One single germ may develop into any number of plasmodia, and they multiply very rapidly. This multiplication of malaria plasmodia goes on in various ways. It is at first scarcely more than a small black dot. Then it reaches out in different directions, forming fresh plasmodia. Sometimes these plasmodia take on the shape of a rosette, each segment forming a separate growth that does its destructive work of poisoning the blood, so depicting the blood cells that they collapse and shrink and take on the shapes here illustrated. The malaria plasmodium darkens the blood, hence the sallow complexion of its victims, which is most striking in those whose whole system is saturated with malaria.

There is no uniformity about the time of these malarial attacks, but the disease usually prevails when the soil is being plowed by the farmers in the spring and fall. It is found in localities where great decay of vegetable matter is constantly going on, as in forests and swamps. Frost destroys the malaria bacillus, and during a severe winter the germs nearest the surface are rendered harmless. But those below the point of freezing, when exposed to the warm sun after plowing time, are very apt to be revivified, becoming as pernicious as ever. The malaria plasmodium yields only to quinine or arsenic, and these plasmodia are invariably found in the blood cells of malarial patients before the administration of these remedies. With their application the plasmodia disappear.

While malaria is not necessarily a serious ailment, it may lead to after troubles of a dangerous character. The malaria plasmodium, being foreign to the blood, is thrown off through the natural scavengers of the body—the liver, the kidneys and the spleen. Thus the liver and spleen are often enlarged in persons afflicted with malaria, and much darker in color than in their normal state. The plasmodia are apt to bring on Bright's disease by attacking the kidneys, and cirrhosis of the liver, by clogging that organ, and nothing but arsenic or quinine will neutralize the poison in the blood. Typical malaria is always accompanied by fever, which is either remittent or intermittent. Remittent fever is continuous, and unless promptly checked may lead to typhoid fever, which is often the serious afterclap of a case of protracted malaria.

THIS IS THE MALARIA PLASMODIUM—THE GERM IN THE BLOOD.

"What do you wish, madam?" said the election officer to Mrs. Tenspot. "You have already voted once to-day. You voted before noon, you know." "Oh, yes, I know that," replied the votress, "but I want to change my ballot."—Harper's Bazar.

A CONSERVATIVE FARMER.

MR J. P. UTLEY, OF MT. VERNON, INTERVIEWED BY A REPORTER.

He Tells of His Sufferings with Trouble of the Stomach—How He Fought It for Years—Physicians Tried to Cure Him but Failed—Finally He Discovered a Remedy and Is Cured.

From the Sun, Mt. Vernon, Ind.

Mr. J. P. Utley, aged 64 years, whose postoffice address is Mt. Vernon, Ind., has been a resident of Posey County for forty-eight years, and is one of Posey County's most prominent and prosperous farmers. Mr. Utley lives in Lynn township, about seven miles northeast of this city, and he desires to speak through the columns of the Sun a few words in behalf of a famous remedy for diseases of the blood, so that his many friends may profit by an experience which he had. Said Mr. Utley a few days ago to a reporter:

"Several years ago I began to suffer with some kind of stomach trouble. My food did not seem to agree with me and I was unable to do any farm work. Food that I ate at times caused severe pains and cramps in my stomach and would cause it to swell. I at first began to doctor with a physician who was traveling through the country, but he did me no good. I then went to Mt. Vernon and consulted one of the best physicians in the city, who pronounced my case abscess of the liver, and began to treat me by first blistering my right side and back. He then gave me one or two different kinds of medicine, all of which afforded me but temporary relief. After doctoring with him for five or six months without receiving any permanent benefit, I tried two other physicians with the same result.

"A year ago last February I was confined to my bed and suffered one of the worst attacks I had ever had, and while doctoring with one of the aforesaid doctors, I read in a paper of the wonderful cures that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People were accomplishing and the testimonials of people who had taken them and been restored to health, so I decided as soon as I was able to get to town, I would buy a box and try them.

"In a few weeks I was able to go out and accordingly went to W. H. Fogas' drug store and procured a box of Pink Pills, which I took home. On my way home I began to study about taking the pills, and became afraid to try them, as I had taken other patent medicines and been doctoring with first-class physicians, so I laid the box away where it stayed until last September. I then began to take one after each meal. The third day after I had been taking them food began to smell good to me. I began to feel better and relish my food, and strange to say it agreed with me, which was something I had not experienced during my three years illness.

"After taking five boxes of the pills I now feel entirely well and am not bothered with my old trouble at all, my only trouble now is that my stomach is not big enough to hold what I desire to eat. I am also able to do as much work as any man of my age.

"Since I have received permanent relief and believe myself cured, I have recommended the Pills to a number of my friends. This is the first proprietary medicine I ever recommended in my life, but I am happy to do it if it will help any sufferer to regain health and bodily activity.

"I occasionally take some of the pills, but not regularly. It is said the pills are stimulating, but I cannot say that they give me any such sensations that I am aware of. They merely cure and that is enough.

(Signed) "J. P. UTLEY."

Heavy Rainfall.

The most phenomenal rainfall recorded in the annals of Ohio took place on August 2, 1861. S. B. McMillan, who gives an account of this remarkable downpour, says that it extended over an area of at least 100 square miles. The total amount of water which fell during the eleven hours of precipitation was 8 inches, and of that quantity 4.3 inches fell in four and one-half hours. What is meant by a fall of 8½ inches of rain in so short a space of time will be better understood when the reader is informed that one inch of rain means 22,000 gallons to the acre. The immense quantity of water will weigh 220,000 pounds, or 100 tons.

Is Grateful.

Fort Wayne, Ind., Nov. 11, '96.

Friend Cupp:—It will be impossible for me to thank all my friends by letter or personally for their generous support given me in the present canvass. By running about six hundred votes ahead of the Presidential ticket, in Ft. Wayne, I am elected by about six hundred majority. I have worked on actively and earnestly in the canvass and so have you and my friends. Kindly thank all of them personally for their efforts in my behalf.

Yours Truly,
JIM ROBINSON.

—When it goes our way we naturally favor a long term for president. When it doesn't, three months or three hours would be enough. Nevertheless, we guess the framers of our constitution put it about right, four years.

Surprised.

Frank Batdorf who now resides in Butler Center was greatly surprised last Saturday evening by a party of seventy of his friends and neighbors. It was his 23rd birthday and his wife quietly notified the people of Butler Center and vicinity of her intentions to surprise him. After the crowd had assembled and a short time had been spent in social games and visiting, a beautiful rocker was presented to him by Philip Noel. Mr. Batdorf responded and thanked them all for their favor. Supper was then served and the evening spent in games and visiting. All had a very pleasant time and left, feeling thankful that they had been among that happy number.

—Rev. W. O. Butler of Waterloo and his half brother, Isaac Preston whose home is near Cleveland, were in town to-day.

Be Patient.

It is well for those who relied on promises of sudden good times, made before election, to be a little patient. In the first place these promises should have been to have little or no foundation. We have often said that certain industries were sure to start up, no matter who was elected. And now that McKinley is elected, it remains true. Some will not. Those who get work to do will start. The others must wait for orders to come in. In the meantime, the McKinley papers all over the country are publishing wild telegrams about the "business boom," a half of which have no foundation whatever. We saw the other day in several exchanges, that the "black smoke from Auburn's factories was rolling up as soon as McKinley was elected." All the people in Auburn know how this is. Again the Columbia City Mail tells its readers, that the "Harper Buggy Factory" and the Body Factoiy" at that place have started up. We passed by the former on Monday of this week, and it is as dead as ever. So it will be seen that the reports in the Chicago papers, and others are half wrong, to say the least And even where factories do start up, we must expect to see them stop now and then as they have always done. No industrial conditions have changed except in the minds of those who wish to make people believe such tales.

HOW TO PREVENT CROUP.

SOME READING THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO YOUNG MOTHERS. HOW TO GUARD AGAINST THE DISEASE

Croup is a terror to young mothers and to post them concerning the cause, first symptoms and treatment is the object of this item. The origin of croup is a common cold. Children who are subject to it take cold very easily and croup is almost sure to follow. The first symp'on is hoarseness: this is soon followed by a peculiar rough cough, which is easily recognized and will never be forgotten by one who has heard it. The time to act is when the child first becomes hoarse. If Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is freely given all ten dency to croup will soon disappear. Even after the croupy cough has developed it will prevent the attack. There is no danger in givirg this remedy for it contains nothing injuious. For sale by Davenport the Druggist. 48

Churubusco Truth; A Churubusco minister it is said recently refused to buy fish from one of our citizens because when questioned the man admitted that the fish had been caught on Sunday. We will take them on subscription no matter when caught.

—A North Dakota editor asks his patrons to play a joke on him something like this; take a sheet of ordinary writing paper, fold carefully and enclose money enough to pay all arrearages and one year in advance. Keep an eye on us and when any one plays such a joke on us, if the editor smiles, the trick works like a charm.

—It was thought Friday that a Kendallville merchant named Boughman had lost his mind. He was seen to walk to and from a couple of stores for over an hour and the police were on the point of interfering with the madman when it was learned that he was only paying an election wager by delivering a bushel of apples, one apple at a time. The gentleman walked over four miles in doing the job.

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

tf JEANNETTE S.

—We had a good visit this week with John Fisher in Ft. Wayne, and his brother Will of Waterloo. The COURIER always reckons the whole family as among our earliest DeKalb friends.

—A bicyele rider in Chicago rode home Saturday night without the lamp required by a city law. He was stopped four times by the police and once by a foot-pad who robbed him of all he had. There is a great revival of business since McKinley was elected.

No Humbug.

Foley's Honey and Tar does not claim to perform miracles. It does not claim to cure all cases of consumption or asthma. But it does claim to give comfort and relief in advanced stages of these diseases and to usually cure early stages. It is certainly worth trying by those afflicted or threatened with these dread diseases. 50c. Robbins & McCord. 48

—Now that the horseless carriages are an assured fact, a philosopher hopes that the country may have dogless sausage, hairles butter, soundless pianos, voiceless elocutionists, acheless backs, oathless profanity, bagless bloomers, and jokeless jokes about all of them.—Bluffton Banner.

—At Amsterdam, N. Y. a carpet making factory has just restored wages to its men. In October, they had cut down 10 per cent. Now they put it back at the old price. As carpets have not changed in price, there was evidently no need of reduction at first, and both that and the restoration were for political effect only. And the poor employes will go on voting for such a state of things.

Too Thin.

Some of our exchanges are publishing wild reports of diphtheria in Auburn. The Chicago Chronicle, with its usual regard for truth, picks these out, and adds that Auburn is in a panic on account of it. It is well for our people to take half the items in the big dailies, as mere guess work or worse. Moral.—Use your money on the DAILY COURIER and get the facts.

The Basket Co are erecting a large addition to their works, and will soon have the girls employed in a room by themselves separate from men and boys.

Daniel Smurr, son of Nelson Smurr, living on the south side was buried last week. He left a wife in very delicate health whose death it was feared would precede his, and two daughters, nearly grown.

John Plowe was home over Sunday from Ashley. He is the oldest shop employe there.

Mabel Freeborn, youngest daughter of Daniel Freeborns, on East North street was buried last Wednesday. She was about 8 years old. A lovely child. Her parents have the heartfelt sympathy of all our people in the loss of their little daughter.

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad oder and saves oil, it is easy to sell. Something to Depend On.

Mr. James Jones, of the drug firm of Jones & Son, Cowden, Ill., in speaking of Dr. King's New Discovery, says that last winter his wife was attacked with LaGrippe, and her case grew so serious that physicians at Cowden and Pana could do nothing for her. It seemed to develop into Hasty Consumption. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in store, and selling lots of it, he took a bottle home, and to the surprise of all she began to get better from first dose, and half dozen dollar bottles cured her sound and well. Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds is guaranteed to do this good work. Try it Free trial bottles at Robbins & McCord's drugstore. 5

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. —Henry Long, brother to Clerk Mike Long, came down from Kendallville this afternoon to visit a few days. His little daughter accompanied him.

—Geo. Shaffer, of Corunna, was a pleasant caller at the COURIER office to-day. He is a new subscriber to the old Reliable and paid the cash. There are several hundred more good farmers in the county who should become subcribers to the COURIER. People appreciate a paper filled with county seat happenings, court items, etc, and much prefer such a paper to those filled up with plate matter.

—Charles L. Thomas at Omaha, makes this week his usual remittance, paying into '97, for which he has thanks. We see by the engraved letter head that he is still a member of the city council, being chairman of the committee on gas and electric lighting. DeKalb people generally set in high places.

—P. S. Henson, the great Chicago divine, has been secured at a large expense to deliver his celebrated lecture on "Fools" at the DeKalb County Teacher's Association in Auburn on the evening of Nov. 27th. This lecture is said to be splendid, and will no doubt attract a good many from the surrounding country.

—Mr. Hines, the new treasure will fix up his bond with the auditor tomorrow, Saturday. A treasurer has to give a big bond, about $150,000 we believe. But we apprehend no one will hesitate about going on Mr. Hines' bond. He will however, not enter on the duties of his office for several days.

—Joe Peffer and wife are rejoicing over the arrival of a fine boy baby, born to them at 10:10 this forenoon. Joe says he will have to call it McKinley, which goes to show that he holds no ill will over the result of the late election. If the little stranger had been born at 16 minutes to 1, he might have called it Bryan.

—James Hogue, of Ligonier, was up here to-day taking out papers as administrator of the estate of his father John Hogue, of LaOtto, who died recently. Mr. Hogue is a brother of Frank and Lydia Hogue of this place, and of Albert Hogue at LaOtto. He is a practicing attorney at Ligonier, and is we hear, doing well.

—T. R. Cool, of South Bend called on the COURIER yesterday in company with S. P. Imhoff this of place. Mr. Cool is a former DeKalb boy, and like the most of them, he has made a success in life, being now in a good position in the Oliver Chilled Plow Works in his town. That reminds us, that he sent out that very train load of plows, that raised so much talk through a dispatch sent out from Butler. Mr. Cool says the flags were there all right, but he did not put on any Bryan pictures and that the Olivers themselves were not Bryan men. As the COURIER copied the dispatch in good faith, we make this statement as we believe Mr. Cool would not make a misstatement.

—Excuse me," observed the man in spectacles "but I am a surgeon, and that is not where the liver is." "Never you mind where his liver is," retorted the other. The old way of delivering messages by post-boys compared with the modern telephone, illustrates the old tedious methods of "breaking" colds compared with their almost instantaneous cure by One Minute Cough Cure. Davenport the Druggist.

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. WM. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by. Davenport the Druggist. 48

—A letter received to-day from the editor's sister in the north part of Laporte county speaks of the good peach crop, they had the past season. They picked the earliest on June 29, and the last Oct. 12. Out here we pay little attention to peaches, though no doubt with proper pains we could do better than we do. As it is quite a number of farms have had partial crop from trees that insisted on growing in spite of neglect.

The wife of Mr. Leonard Wells, of East Brimfield, Mass., had been suffering from neuralgia for two days, not being able to sleep or hardly keep still, when Mr. Holden, the merchant there sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Pain Balm, and asked that she give it a thorough trial. On meeting Mr. Wells the next day he was told that she was all right, the pain had left her within two hours, and that the bottle of Pain Balm was worth $5.00 if it could not be had for less. For sale at 50 cents per bottle by. Davenport the Druggist. 48

—Hon. James A. Mount will be in inaugurated as governor of Indiana on the 11th, of January. He will be the third "farmer governor" elected in this state since the close of the war. In 1980, Albert G. Porter a lawyer defeated Franklin Landers. In 1884, Isaac P. Gray, a lawyer, defeated Major Wm. L. Calkins. In 1888, Gen. Alvin P. Hovey, an extensive land owner and lawyer defeated Courtland C. Matson. In 1889 Claude Matthews, then secretary of state but prior to that a farmer, defeated Ex-Governor Chase.

Churning Done in One Minute.

I have tried the Lightning Churn, you recently described in your paper, and it is certainly a wonder. I can churn in less than one minute, and the butter is elegant, and you get considerably more butter than when you use a common churn. I took the agency for the churn here and every butter maker that sees it buys one. I have sold three dozen and they give the best of satisfaction. I know I can sell 100 in this township, as they churn so quickly, make so much more butter than common churns and are so cheap. Some one in every township can make two or three hundred dollars selling these churns. By addressing J. F. Casey & Co, St. Louis, you can get circulars and full information so you can make big money right at home. I have made $80 the past two weeks and I have never sold anything in my life before.

The smallest salary drawn by any national chief executive in the civilized world is that which the president of the republic of Andorra receives. It is 6 shillings a month.

—Owing to poor crops in nearly every wheat growing country, those nations that formerly came into competition with us in selling wheat, are now obliged to buy of us. So wheat has gone up. So when a man tells you McKinley did it, explain it to him.

CIRCLING THE GLOBE.

CONCISE HISTORY OF SEVEN DAYS' DOINGS.

Intelligence by Electric Wire from Every Quarter of the Civilized World, Embracing Foreign Affairs and Home Happenings of an Important Nature.

IS IT WAR?

The Government Wants Information from the Railroads.

A special dispatch from Washington says: The War Department has called on the leading trunk lines running to Key West, New Orleans and other gulf ports for an immediate statement of their capacity to move troops, supplies and heavy war material. Information is demanded complete to the most minute detail and embraces such questions as: "If you are required to move 5,000 troops over your lines with necessary equipment and supplies, how long after notification will you require to perform the service?" Caution as to secrecy is imposed on all roads called on for information.

Schooner Wrecked.

A special from Cleveland says: The schooner Brenton was driven ashore just east of the river in a terrible storm of wind and snow. The life-saving crew succeeded, after much difficulty, in rescuing the crew of five men. The schooner is pounding hard and will soon be a total wreck. The schooner Marine City, coal laden, was also blown ashore near the river entrance, but was pulled off without being seriously damaged. The wind is blowing forty miles an hour from the northwest and is accompanied by a blinding snow storm. A very heavy sea is running and but few vessels are venturing out.

English Capital Coming In.

Pittsburgh special: A bicycle manufacturer who has been in Europe all summer is authority for the statement that the Dunlop Tire Company of England, has gobbled the interests of the Morgan & Wright Tire Company of America. The latter firm received almost $4,000,000. The Dunlop Company is capitalized at $6,000,000. The name of the American firm will not be changed for five years. Morgan & Wright cleared $1,750,000 last year. An English syndicate is also dickering for the E. C. Stearns bicycle plant at Syracuse, and offers $2,000,000 for the Stearns interests.

Spain Acknowledges Reverses in Cuba.

In an interview at Madrid, Premier Canovas Del Castillo said that there had been serious reverses in Cuba, but that these ought not to discourage the national spirit. Within the present month, he said, the government were sending such reinforcements to Cuba and the Phillipine Islands as should be able to put an end to the wars in both countries in a short time. Until the country objected to the sacrifices, he declared, the government would never desist in their prosecution of the wars in Cuba and the Phillipines.

Is It Justice Carlisle?

The rumor is going the rounds in Washington that Associate Judge Field may retire from the Supreme Bench, and allow President Cleveland to name Secretary Carlisle as his successor. Justice Field would have retired two or three years ago, but he has had such hatred for Cleveland that he wanted some other President to name his successor, though he admires Carlisle.

Three McKinley Votes from Delaware.

Governor Watson of Delaware, has issued a proclamation declaring that all of the votes cast for James G. Shaw and James G. Shaw, jr., for presidential electors shall count for James G. Shaw, as his name was on the several ballots in two ways. This will send three McKinley electors from Delaware to the electoral college.

The Kentucky Returns.

Frankfort special: Returns from all the 119 counties in the State have been received at the office of Secretary of State. On the national ticket they show a total vote of 445,000. McKinley's vote is 219,655; Bryan's, 218,798; McKinley's plurality, 257. The returns are in much earlier than usual and it is probable the canvassing board will begin its work soon.

Miss Lizzie Hendricks, a Calhoun County, Ala., girl, was awarded $245 damages from the Southern Railway Company by the Circuit Court here for being kissed by one of the company's conductors while en route recently from Birmingham to Anniston.

SIX SEAMEN PERISH.

Schooner Waukesha and Her Drunken Crew Go Down.

Under cover of the darkness and in the midst of a fierce storm, six men met their death off Muskegon, Mich., harbor Saturday night from the three-mast schooner Waukesha. The story of the only survivor lays the blame upon Captain Duncan Corbett. This survivor is Frank Dulach. He does not know the names of any of the other members of the crew, which consisted of the captain, mate, cook and four sailors, a total of seven. After being rescued Dulach was so weak that it was night before an intelligent story could be obtained from him. It was taken in the form of an affidavit before a magistrate. The story which Dulach tells is of a drunken captain and a wild debauch in the midst of a howling storm. Nothing in the history of navigation on the great lakes equals it. Even after the boat was going to pieces and the blood-soaked form of one of the men had disappeared in the waves and the inky blackness of the night, while the survivors were clinging for life to a rude raft, Corbett continued his drinking and finally fell a besotted mass into the waves. One by one the six of the seven men on the raft, the entire crew of the boat, fell off, until just as day broke Dulach saw the white surf boat of the Muskegon life saving station coming, with Captain Wood at the tiller. He feebly motioned them how to approach him, and was lifted into the boat.

CLEVELAND DRAWS A MORAL.

President Releases the Imprisoned California A. R. U. Men.

The President has pardoned W. H. Clune, Isaac Ross and Phillip Stanwood, of California, sentenced Dec. 6, 1894, to pay a fine of $1 and to be confined in the Los Angeles County jail eighteen months for conspiracy, the offense being committed in the railway riots, at that time general throughout the country. The President wrote the following indorsement on the application: "These convicts have suffered more than nine months' imprisonment under their sentences. I am bound to assume that they were guilty of an offense most dangerous in its character, and in the commission of which they aided and encouraged an unlawful defiance of authority which threatened the most distressing consequences. I am convinced, however, that these men are not criminals, but laboring men swept into a violation of law by at first listening to the counsels of disorder. Others besides themselves are suffering humiliation and deprivation on account of their wrongdoing; and I am led to believe that the purposes of punishment so far as the effect on the prisoners is concerned have been fully accomplished. I am also convinced that the imprisonment already suffered by these prisoners will be ample warning to the thousands equally guilty, though unpunished, and to those who may be hereafter tempted, that the laws enacted to secure peace and order must be obeyed."

MRS. W. H. VANDERBILT.

Widow of the Famous Millionaire Dies of Heart Disease.

Mrs. Mary Louise Vanderbilt, widow of the late William H. Vanderbilt, died Friday at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard, at Scarboro, in Westchester County, N. Y. Mrs. Vanderbilt had been visiting at the Shepard residence since the wedding of her granddaughter. Mrs. Vanderbilt was Miss Louise Kissam, daughter of a reformed church minister of Albany. She was married to William H. Vanderbilt in 1841, and has for years been noted for her deeds of charity. The children of the marriage were Cornelius, William Kissam, Frederick W., George W., Margaret Louisa, who became the wife of the late Elliott F. Shepard; Emily Thorn, wife of William D. Sloane; Florence Adele, wife of H. McK. Twombley; and Eliza O., wife of W. Seward Webb.

Threaten a Trust.

Chicago has become such a thorn in the side of the great wire nail trust that its managers have openly declared they would like to see it blotted off the map. The main reason for the trust's antipathy is that one of the leading jobbing concerns persists in openly defying the trust's mandates. This defiance not only threatens to demoralize all of the other jobbing concerns in Chicago, but in other cities as well and actually threatens the existence of the trust itself. The firm in question openly quotes a price of $2.40 a keg on nails, as against $2.80 as the trust price, which other jobbers are forced to maintain. Meanwhile the high prices have tempted a large number of small manufacturers to enter the field and their aggregate production is gradually gaining on the demand. Another source of trouble is the recent actions began against the trust in the Federal courts. In a suit begun in the United States Court at Indianapolis Lewis C. Bramkamp, of Cincinnati, asks $300,000 damages, petitions that the trust's contracts with outsiders be declared illegal and asks that the trust be dissolved. The damages are asked because the trust stopped delivery of forty nailmaking machines which he had contracted of an Anderson (Ind.) manufacturer and because all other nail machine manufacturers were under contracts not to sell to outsiders.

Salisbury on Venezuela.

Lord Salisbury announced in his speech at the Mansion House in London Monday night that the dispute between Great Britain and the United States over the Venezuelan boundary had virtually been settled in terms which the United States, through Secretary Olney, insisted upon, the whole question to be referred to unrestricted arbitration. The only condition attached is the one proposed by Secretary Olney that the title of the bona fide settlers to their present holdings, in case the arbitrator's award places them in the jurisdiction of Venezuela, shall be decided by the laws governing private titles. The British law provides among other things that the title to land which has been unassailed for twenty-one years cannot be invalidated. Venezuela, in other words, would be debarred from confiscating property in any territory she may acquire under the arbitration. Lord Salisbury says England can accomplish nothing for the Armenians by isolated action, but he holds out hope for European concert.

Pleaded for Her Assailant.

William Bean, the negro who beat Mrs. L. C. Clark at Lebanon, Ky., was captured and put in jail. A mob took him from the Sheriff and carried him before Mrs. Clark, who identified him. She is expected to die, but she pleaded with the crowd to let the law take its course. Negroes as well as whites threaten to lynch Bean if Mrs. Clark dies.

Failure of a Dayton House.

The Manhattan Clothing and Shoe Company of Dayton, Ohio, has assigned, with liabilities aggregating $100,000. This concern is owned by Gus Hanauer, and the difficulty does not affect the branch houses located in cities in the East and West.

Light on a Cleveland Murder.

William Clark confessed to the Akron, Ohio, officers that he and William Dempsey are guilty of the murder of Joseph Lupineck, a college student, on the streets of Cleveland late on the night of Oct. 25.

Silk Threads an Aid to Crime.

William P. Hazen, chief of the secret service, treasury department, in his annual report expresses the opinion that the distinctive paper in use for money is an aid to the criminal rather than a protection to the public, because of the fact that a note printed upon paper containing silk threads (as a number of the best counterfeits and all of the raised notes are) is accepted in a majority of instances without hesitation, owing to the erroneous impression that the paper used by the government is manufactured by a secret process and cannot be counterfeited. He has also become convinced that the introduction of silk into paper tends to lessen its wearing quality and is therefore responsible to a degree for its short life.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT WILL SAY

His Message Will Recommend the Retirement of Legal Tenders.

A Washington correspondent says: President Cleveland is considering the financial portions of his annual message to Congress. He has been in consultation with Secretary Carlisle and Postmaster General Wilson regarding the prospective revenues and expenses of the Government, as well as the reforms that are necessary to the present monetary system, and his last annual message to Congress will discuss these matters in detail. The President will, as heretofore, recommend the retirement of the legal tender notes of the Government, so as to take the Government out of the banking business and make it impossible for speculators to drain the treasury of gold by means of an endless chain of greenbacks and Sherman notes, which must be reissued as fast as they are redeemed. In order to avoid any contraction of the currency it is part of the administration plan to have this redemption of legal tenders accompanied by amendments to the banking laws, so as to enable the banks to issue a larger volume of currency which they will be compelled to redeem in gold on demand. Whether the President will make any recommendations regarding increased revenues is uncertain, but he will thoroughly discuss the revenue situation and will doubtless take occasion to point out that the principal reason for the failure of the present tariff law to produce sufficient revenue is that it has been in operation during a period of great business depression, when the country was under the constant threat of a depreciated currency.

FAMINE THREATENS IRELAND.

Most Appalling Prospect Among All Small Farmers.

Ireland is threatened with a most awful famine, and unless the Government helps before Parliament opens the suffering will be frightful. The landlords all through the stricken country are applying for evictment decrees by the thousand, and as all of the crops have failed, the poorer classes are in most desperate straits. As soon as winter sets in the demand for relief will be most clamorous.

Fine on a Jealous Postmaster.

At Mankato, Minn., Judge Lochren Wednesday sentenced Postmaster E. S. Humble, of Dundee, to pay a fine of $1, the lowest possible penalty, for detaining and opening a letter addressed by his wife to an Iowa man with whom Humble claims she was infatuated. Judge Lochren said that if there was an offense it was entirely technical, and circumstances went far to justify Humble, who pleaded guilty.

Reception to Bryan.

The citizens of Denver and of Colorado will extend such a reception to William Jennings Bryan Nov. 24 as has been equaled in the West only by the remarkable demonstration at the return of Senator H. M. Teller from the St. Louis convention. It is proposed to invite men of national reputation and standing, and to hold in Denver a conference which will start the silver forces at work for the campaign of 1900.

Cotton Crop Killed.

The Texas cotton crop of 1896 is at an end. A killing frost has fallen and the fields are as black as soot. There is not a particle of life left in the plant. A few more bales can be picked out, but fully 90 per cent. has been marketed. There are a small number of bales left about farmhouses, waiting and hoping for a price which the smallest crop in ten years ought to command.

Texas Banker Kills Himself.

Frank Hamilton, for twenty years a member of the Austin, Texas, banking firm of Raymond & Co., committed suicide Wednesday by taking morphine. Despondency over financial losses is supposed to have led to the act. He was well known in financial circles in New York. He was married Monday to an Austin lady.

Cuba's Constitution.

Anticipating the early evacuation of Cuba by Spain, the Cuban leaders of New York are taking steps to form a Constitution for the republic. A preliminary organization with this work in hand has already been formed, and in a few days the organization will be made permanent

CUBA IN THE BALANCE

FATE OF THE ISLAND LIKELY TO BE SETTLED SOON.

Recognition of Rebels or Intervention May Ensue—Uncle Sam Is Waiting—Administration Proposes to Maintain Strict Neutrality.

Affairs Near a Crisis.

Washington dispatch: It is the firm conviction of officers of the administration that a crisis is approaching in Cuban affairs, and that the only safe course for the United States to pursue is to await developments. Many sensational stories are afloat about immediate intervention by the United States and extensive military preparations for prospective trouble with Spain. It can be stated with authority that the President regards the present military situation on the island as far too critical to warrant action by the United States at this time.

That the military operations now actively begun by the Spanish will result in bringing matters to such a stage as to necessitate the recognition of the insurgents or intervention in the interest of humanity, the authorities regard as absolutely certain. The President is so thoroughly convinced that there will soon be important changes in the situation by reason of the military operations that are now in progress that he has not touched upon the Cuban clause of his message at all. This will be the last chapter written.

Pending further developments on the island, the attitude of the administration will continue to be one of strict neutrality. If there is no material change by the time Congress convenes, the President's treatment of the Cuban question in his message will be much the same as last year. It can be stated authoritatively that the report made by General Lee during his recent conferences with the President and the Secertary of State will not be productive of any immediate change in the attitude of the United States.

The presence in Washington of Admiral Bunce, of the North Atlantic squadran, and his lengthy conference with Secretary Herbert have given rise to many sensational reports about impending trouble with Spain. One of the alarming reports is that the administration has now become thoroughly convinced that Spain's extensive preparations at home and the recent large augmentation of the military forces in Cuba are in anticipation of a conflict with this country to be provoked by Spain for the purpose of preserving her dignity in the loss of Cuba. There is no justification for war talk at this time. The visit of Admiral Bunce had to do with the repair work on the vessels of his squadron and his winter's cruise.

THE POPULAR VOTE.

How It Has Stood in Various Quadrennial Contests.

While the electoral vote decides who shall be President, it is always of interest to know the popular vote cast for successful presidential candidates. Prior to 1828 there was no "popular vote" which is worth recording. At the time when the Federalists and Republicans or Jeffersonians were fighting for power the electors in most States were chosen by the Legislature. After the break-up of the Federalist party there was a long period during which each quadrennial contest was a strife between men rather than measures. There were not strong and well-organized parties in the field as there are now.

The following table gives the actual votes and pluralities, excluding the minority candidates, in years when the pluralities have been over 200,000.

Year.	Candidates.		Plurality.
1852	Pierce	1,601,474	214,896
	Scott	1,386,578
1856	Buchanan	1,838,169	496,905
	Fremont	1,341,264
1860	Lincoln	1,866,352	491,195
	Douglas	1,375,157
1864	Lincoln	2,216,067	407,342
	McClellan	1,808,725
1868	Grant	3,015,071	305,458
	Seymour	2,709,613
1872	Grant	3,597,070	762,601
	Greeley	2,834,079
1892	Cleveland	5,554,226	379,025
	Harrison	5,175,201

Whether in proportion to the total vote cast McKinley's plurality will be as large as that received by Grant cannot be told until the returns are all received.

GOVERNMENT CROP REPORT.

Indications of a Slight Increase in the Rate of Yield for Corn.

The returns to the Department of Agriculture for the month of November as to rate of yield make the average of corn 27.3 bushels, which is above the yield indicated by the condition figures in October. Last year the preliminary estimate of yield was 26.2 bushels. The rates of yield in the large and principal corn States are as follows: New York, 31.7; Pennsylvania, 37.1; Ohio, 39.9; Michigan, 37; Indiana, 32.4; Illinois, 40.4; Minnesota, 30.6; Iowa, 37.7; Missouri, 26.3; Kansas, 27.1; Nebraska, 37.2.

The average yield of buckwheat is 18.7 bushels an acre, against 20.1 bushels last year, and 16.1 for the year 1894. The average yield an acre of potatoes is 86.8 bushels, which, though not phenomenal, is nevertheless above the average for the last ten years. The average yield of hay as indicated by the preliminary returns is 1.36 tons, against 1.06 last year. The average yield of tobacco is 679 pounds an acre, against 743 pounds last year, and 735 pounds in the year 1894.

The European agent notes the lack of trustworthy estimates of the Russian wheat shortage. The advance in price which is expected to be fairly well maintained will result in increased acreage in Great Britain. Wet weather in October throughout Central Europe was unfavorable for the potato crop. A good corn yield has been realized on the lower Danube.

OUR FOREIGN MAILS.

Over Six Million Pounds Sent Across the Seas to Other Countries.

The annual report of Capt. N. M. Brooks, superintendent of foreign mails, shows that the aggregate weight of the mail dispatched from this country by sea to other countries during the past fiscal year was 6,286,914 pounds, of which over 4,500,000 pounds were transatlantic. It is pointed out that the postage collected by the Government on articles exchanged with foreign countries largely exceeds the gross receipts incurred by the department in connection with that service. The sum of $5,294,756 was received by this country for mail exchanged with other countries. Only 1,516 errors were reported in the distribution of 11,518,373 letters and post cards.

The net excess of cost of the contract ocean mail service was $453,386. Action is recommended on the questions of the extension of the parcels post system; the reduction of the registration fee to 5 cents, and on that of a limited responsibility for registered articles lost or destroyed in the international mails in transit through the United States.

THE OFFICIAL COUNT.

M'KINLEY'S PLURALITY IN THE STATE 18,960.

Figures Are Given for All but Three Counties—Mount, Owen, Haggard, and Scholz on the State Ticket Run Ahead—Populist Vote Not United.

The Exact Figures.

The Indianapolis Journal presented in its table Tuesday morning the vote for President, as determined by the official canvass from all but three counties—Brown, Martin and Newton—and in these the official returns will not vary much from the unofficial count. The returns place McKinley's plurality in Indiana at 18,960. The plurality of Mount, Owen, Haggard and Scholz, on the State ticket, will run about 4,000 ahead of this, owing to the fact that Shively and the rest of their opponents did not get the advantage of the full Populist vote. The pluralities of Daily, Ketcham and Remy are cut down by the pasters that were hustled out at the last moment. The table follows:

TRAMP SAVES PASSENGER TRAIN.

Tells a Story Which the Authorities Do Not Fully Credit.

Early Tuesday morning, as the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern west-bound passenger train with 300 passengers was nearing Burton's Gap, four miles west of Mitchell, the engineer was attracted by the waving of a switch lamp. The train was stopped and the wounded body of a tramp was discovered on the tracks. Some distance farther along five sticks of dynamite and a large quantity of nitroglycerin were found. The tramp gave his name as G. C. Byrum, from Baltimore. He says that about a week ago he was asleep in a box car when three men entered and in the dark unfolded a plan for wrecking the train. The time was set for Monday night, the place described and all the details carefully given. The tramp had gone east as far as Cincinnati, but was so impressed with the plot that he was unable to rest. He thought of relating his story to the police, but feared they would treat it as the ravings of a crazy man. He returned to Mitchell and Monday night went to the place described by the men. He discovered five men and the dynamite on the track. He had barely time to run up the track, knock off a switchlamp and save the train. The wreckers fired at him from ambush, one shot taking effect in the leg. The tramp is a very intelligent man. The police think he is a confederate of the conspirators and at the last moment weakened and endeavored to turn the plot to his own advantage. The passengers raised a purse for him.

Minor State Matters.

Bert Comins, an employe on ex-Congressman Yaple's farm, near Lagrange, committed suicide while temporarily insane.

Jos. Rosenthal, of Peru, a well-known capitalist and manufacturer, was stricken with paralysis at Kokomo, and is in a critical condition.

Miss Wesemecht, an Indiana young woman, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Congregational Church at Mattawan, Mich.

The most remarkable well in the history of the gas belt was struck west of Anderson Thursday. Its pressure is above 340 pounds. Efforts to throw a silver dollar down it sideways proved unsuccessful, as the pressure is strong enough to force it out. It is 120 pounds stronger than the other wells of the gas belt, and seems to be permanent. It was drilled in territory considered unprofitable.

The trolley car is a great demoralizer of prices of residence property under certain conditions. "Chestnut Wood," once the residence of Charles J. Bonaparte at Baltimore, on which he spent $100,000, was sold last week for $20,000 because an electric railway passed close to the house.

Bear Adopts a Little Girl.

Little 4-year-old Helma Ursler wandered away from her home near Snowshoe, Pa., Oct. 22. She was swallowed up by the wilderness of the Alleghany Mountains. A large searching party turned out. Late Saturday afternoon four lumbermen found the child about a mile and a half from her home in the dense woods playing happily with two bear cubs. The men were taking Helma away when a 300-pound female bear dashed out from the underbrush. After a desperate struggle the beast was killed with axes. Fritz Yaneer's right arm was terribly lacerated and amputation may be necessary.

WHEN OTHERS FAIL CONSULT

CHAPTER VII—(Continued.)

The color on Hanbury's face deepened. His eyes flashed. It was intolerable that this low, ill-shaped creature should refer to Dora, to Dora—to whom he was engaged, who was to be his wife, as "a woman in the case." Anyway, there was nothing for it but to try to muzzle Leigh. He forced himself to say calmly: "The lady who was with me is——"

"Miss Ashton."

"Yes. She told me she gave you her name and mine. Well, Mr. Leigh, you are good enough to say you remember me as a speaker. I am seriously thinking of adopting a public career. I could not, for a time at all events, appear on any platform of disputed principles if this unfortunate fainting of mine got into the papers. Some opponent would be certain to throw it in my face. Will you do me the very great personal favor of keeping the matter to yourself?"

"A personal favor from me to you. On what grounds do you put the request?"

"On any honorable grounds you please. You said you were not rich——"

"I did not say I was corrupt." His manner was quick, abrupt, final. His face darkened. His eyes glittered. "Mr. Hanbury, you are a rich man——"

"Not rich, surely."

"You are rich, compared with any man in this street. You are a rich man. You got your money without work or risk. You are young and clever, and tall and straight, and healthy and good-looking, and eloquent and dear to the most beautiful lady I ever laid eyes on——"

"Curse him!" thought Hanbury, but he held his peace, remained without movement of limb or feature.

"Rich, good-looking, sound, beloved, eloquent, young. Look at me. Poor, ill-favored, marred and maimed, loathed, ungifted in speech, middle-aged. Do not stop me. I have no chance if I allow you, a gentleman of your eloquence, to speak against me. Think of it all, and then work out a little calculation for me, and tell me the result. Will you do so candidly, fairly, honestly?"

"Yes, indeed, I will."

"Very well. You who are gifted, as I have said, and ask me to do you a favor, ask me to sell you a favor. Suppose the favor you ask me to do cost me ten, at how much do you estimate its value to you?"

"A hundred. Anything you like."

"I am not thinking of money."

"Nor am I. Anything tenfold returned to you I will freely give."

"Wait a moment. Let me think a while."

Leigh sat with his chin sunken deeply on his chest, and his eyes fixed on the floor. Then he spoke in a low tone, a tone half of reverie:

"Nature deals in wonders, and I am one of them. And I, in turn, deal in wonders, and there are many of them. If I chose I could show you the most wonderful clock in all the world, and I could show you the most wonderful gold in all the world, more wonderful a thousand times than mystery gold. But I will not show you these things now. I will show you a more wonderful thing still. Will you come with me a little way?"

"Yes, but you have not set me that question in arithmetic yet."

"I cannot do so until you have come a little way with me. I want to show you the most wonderful thing you ever saw."

"May I ask what it is?"

"You need not be afraid."

"Why need not I be afraid?"

"Because you are not hump-backed and chicken-breasted and lop-sided and dwarfed and hideous."

"But what are you taking me to see?"

"Something more wonderful and more precious than any mystery gold, than my own miracle gold or my clock, and yet of a kind common enough."

"What?"

"A woman."

"But why should I go?"

"Come, and if you ask me that when you have seen, I will ask nothing for my silence."

"Only a woman?"

"Only a woman."

They descended the stairs.

CHAPTER VIII.

That morning when Edith Grace fell asleep in the corner of the third-class carriage, on her way from Millway to the city, she sank into the most profound unconsciousness.

When she opened her eyes again they had arrived at the next town. She was conscious of being shaken by the shoulder; she awoke and saw opposite her a stout, kind-faced country woman, with a basket on her arm. The woman said: "They want your ticket."

A ticket collector standing at the seat, impatient of delay, was flicking the tickets in his hand. She started and colored, and sat upright with all haste and began searching quickly, anxiously, despairingly.

"I—I can't find my ticket."

"It's a bad job, then," said the collector.

The train had stopped and two passengers got out, the one who had spoken to her saying: "I hope it will be all right, my dear. You don't look as if you was up to anything bad. You don't look like one of them swindling girls that they sent to prison for a fortnight last week."

"Oh!" cried Edith, piteously, as she stepped out on the platform. She covered her face with her hands and burst into tears. She felt completely overwhelmed, as if she should die. The collector and two trainmen were standing round her, waiting until she should recover herself. Presently a fourth man came up slowly from the further end of the train and stood among the three men.

"What is the matter?" he asked softly. "Has anything happened to the lady? Is she ill?"

A shiver went through Edith. There was something familiar in the voice, but unfamiliar in the tone.

"Lost her ticket and hasn't got any money," answered the collector.

"Pooh, money!" said the newcomer, contemptuously. "I have money. Where has the lady come from? How much is the fare? Here you are." The newcomer held out his hand to the collector with money in it.

"This gentleman offers to pay, miss," said the collector, turning to Edith. "Am I to take the money?"

The girl swayed to and fro, and did not answer. It was plain she had heard what had been said. Her movement was an acknowledgment she had heard. She did not answer because she did not know what to say. Two powerful emotions were conflicting in her. The feeling of weakness was passing away. She was trying to choose between jail (for so the matter seemed to her) and deliverance at his hands.

"Of course the lady will allow me to arrange this little matter for her. She can pay me back at any time. I will give her my name and address: Oscar Leigh, Forbes' bakery, Chetwynd street."

Leigh was standing in front of her, leaning on his stick and gazing intently at her. With a cry of astonishment he let his stick fall and threw up his arms. "Miss Grace! Miss Grace, as I am alive! Miss Grace here! Miss Grace here now!"

He dropped his arms. His cry and manner bereft her of the power of speech. She felt abashed and confounded. She seemed to have treated badly this man who had just delivered her from a serious and humiliating difficulty.

"Pray excuse me," he said, bowing low and raising his hat as he picked up his stick. "The sight of you astonished me out of myself. I thought you were miles and miles away. I thought you were at Eltham House. To what great misfortune does my poor mother owe your absence? You are not—please say you are not ill?"

"I am not ill. I—I was going home to Grimsby street."

He hurried her into the moving train. She sat drawn back, pale and stunned in a seat while he, lifting his hat, left her, returning only when they reached the city. Here he insisted on securing a cab for her, giving the driver his fare and the address before she had time to hesitate or protest. Then he turned briskly away, and proceeded east, going from one street into another, until he turned into the dirtiest and dingiest one he had yet traversed.

The ground floor of one of the houses was devoted to commerce. The floor, as far in as one could see, was littered with all kinds of odds and ends of metal machines and utensils and implements. On a washed-out board, in washed-out white letters, over the door, were the words "John Timmons," in large letters, and beneath in small letters, once black and now a streaky gray, "marine store dealer." Into the misty twilight of this house of bankrupt and forgeless Vulcan Leigh disappeared.

If a listener had been at the back of the store, behind the boiler of a donkey engine, or leaned over the head of the dark cellar in the left corner, he would have heard the following dialogue carried on by careful whispers in the darkness below:

"Yes. I have come back sooner than I expected. I went to Milwaukee yesterday morning to consult a very clever mechanic there about the new movement for the figures of time in my clock."

"You told me you were going away."

"My friend not only put me right about the new movement, but when I told him I thought I was on the point of perfecting my discovery of the combination in metals, he told me he would be able to find a market for me if I was sure the new compound was equal to representation. Of course, I told him the supply would be limited until I could arrange for a proper laboratory and for help. I explained that no patent could protect all the processes of manufacture and that for the present the method must be a profound secret. I also told him I proposed calling my invention Miracle Gold."

"There's no doubt it will be."

"I told him my great difficulty at present was the color—that it was very white—too like Australian gold—too much silver."

"That was clever, very clever. You are the cleverest man I ever met."

"I told him also that for the present the quantity would be small of the miracle gold, but that I hoped soon to increase the supply as soon as I got fully to work."

"What did he say the stuff would be worth?"

"In the pure metal state?"

"Of course. After you are done with it."

"He will not say until he has a specimen. When can you have some ready?"

"Now. This minute. Will you take it away with you?"

"No, not now. What are you doing tonight?"

"Nothing particular."

"Can you come to my place between twelve and half past?"

"Certainly."

"Without fail?"

"I'll be there to the minute you say."

"Very well. Let it be twelve exactly. I have a most excellent reason of my own for punctuality. Bring some of the alloy with you. Knock at the door once. I'll open for you myself."

"I shall be there punctually at twelve. I'll not keep you waiting for me to-night."

CHAPTER IX.

Grimsby street, where Mrs. Grace, Edith's grandmother, had lodgings, to which Edith Grace had been driven that morning, is one of the humble, dull, dingy kind.

Mrs. Grace lived at No. 28, half way down the street. She rented the first floor unfurnished. She had lost some money in the disaster which swallowed up her granddaughter's little all. The utmost economy now became necessary for the old woman, and she had resolved to give up the tiny room until now Edith's.

That Thursday morning when Edith alighted from the cab, Mrs. Grace was sitting in her front room window looking out at the placid, drab street. With an exclamation of surprise and dismay she ran down stairs, let the girl in, embraced and kissed her, crying: "My darling! my darling child! What has happened? Is there no such place at all as Eltham House, or has it been burned down?"

Edith burst into tears. She was not given to weeping, but the relief at finding herself at home, after the anxiety and adventures through which she had gone, broke her down, and, with her arm round the old woman's waist, she led Mrs. Grace to the sitting room.

Then, in a few words, she told all to the old woman. She explained her flight by saying this Mr. Leigh had wearied her with attentions. She said nothing about his having asked her to let him kiss her patriarchally. She wound up by declaring she could not endure him and his objectionable devotion, and that she had come away by the first train, having left a note to ask the place did not suit her, and that her luggage was to be sent after her. Then she told of the loss of her ticket and Mr. Leigh's opportune appearance, and last of all, of his promise or threat of calling.

The story, as it met the ears of Mrs. Grace, did not show Leigh in a very offensive light. Off and on Mrs. Grace sat at the window until afternoon. At one o'clock she ate a light luncheon; having by a visit to Edith's room found that the girl slept, she let her sleep on. Time slipped away, and she began to think that after all Mr. Leigh might not come, when, lifting her eyes from her work, she saw two men cross the road and approach the house. One of these was the dwarf, the other a complete stranger to her, a tall, powerful-looking young man. The two seemed in earnest discourse. They disappeared from view and Mrs. Grace heard them ascend and knock. She heard the door opened and Mrs. Grace heard hastened to Edith, whom she found just awake, and told her that Mr. Leigh had arrived. Then she went back to the sitting room, and, when word came up that Mr. Leigh and a friend wished to see her, sent down an invitation for the gentlemen to come up.

"I do myself, Mrs. Grace, the great pleasure and honor of calling upon you to inquire after Miss Grace, and I have taken the liberty of asking my friend to keep me company," said the little man, bowing profoundly.

Mrs. Grace, waving her hand to a couple of chairs, said: "I am glad to see you and your friend, Mr. Leigh. Will you please be seated?"

"Mrs. Grace, my friend, Mr. John Hanbury, whose fame as a public speaker is as wide as the ground covered by the English language."

"Very happy, indeed, to make Mr. Hanbury's acquaintance, and very much honored by Mr. Hanbury's call," said the old lady.

The two men sat down. Hanbury felt uncomfortable at Leigh's bombastic introduction, but at the moment he was completely powerless. He felt indignant at this man calling him a friend, but Leigh had it in his power to make him seem ridiculous over a good part of the city; there was nothing to do but to grin and bear it.

"I hope Miss Grace has taken no harm of her fright?"

"No, thank you, Mr. Leigh. I am sure I don't know what she would have done only for your opportune appearance on the scene. Here she is to thank you in person."

The door opened and Edith Grace, pale and impassive, entered the room.

Hanbury made a step forward, and cried, "Dora!"

The little man laid his hand on the young man's arm and held him back. Hanbury looked down at the dwarf in anger and glanced quickly at the girl.

"My granddaughter, Miss Grace—Mr. John Hanbury, whose speeches I have often asked you to read for me, Edith."

Hanbury fell back a pace and bowed mechanically like one in a dream. He looked from the dwarf to the girl and from the girl to the dwarf, but could find no word to say, had no desire to say a word. He was completely overcome with amazement.

(To be continued.)

The Snake Fanned Him.

"About five years ago," said C. T. Buckman, a well-known resident of Visalia, "while I was spending the summer in the mountains northeast of Visalia, I captured a large bullsnake.

"Being alone in the mountains and having lots of spare time on my hands, I was able to teach Slippery Dick tricks. I taught him to come at call, to coil up, to dance, and many other tricks. He would coil up on the table, his head in the center of the coil, elevated about six inches in the air. I would place the handle of a small fan in his mouth and then Dick would gently wave the fan to and fro, and thus keep the flies and insects away from my face when I slept.

"He was as good as a cat to keep the house free from mice. I often saw him bring in ten or twelve in a day. His fondness for mice was his ruin. It happened this way: One day I missed Dick, and though I hunted and called all day, I could not find a trace of my pet. One day, about a week after his disappearance, having occasion to explore the loft of the cabin in which I was residing, I came across the remains of my old friend. Apparently he had been more than ordinarily mouse hungry, and in his haste to satiate his appetite he had swallowed a live mouse, and the mouse had done the rest. Poor Dick! I can imagine his surprise at the strange commotion on his inside, but it was a case of reward for gluttony. No doubt he repented when it was too late."—San Francisco Call.

A Long Slide.

A system of rapid transit transportation is in use in California, which for cheapness of operating expense is probably the lowest in the country, despite the fact that the cost of construction was very high, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. A lumber company in Fresno county, California, has built a lumber flume fifty-two miles long, which in places has a grade of 23 per cent. and which crosses a suspension bridge 451 feet long, something on the plan of the great suspension bridges across the Niagara gorge. The flume is V-shaped, and, strange to say, in addition to carrying lumber, is utilized for the transportation of passengers—one way—for, like the road to ruin in old temperance books, the line only runs one way, and that down. The boat in which the passengers travel, or perhaps it would be better to say shoot, is a V-shaped box about sixteen feet long, and which is roughly knocked together with boards, since its "good for one trip only." The front end of the strange craft is left off, as the velocity of the water is so great, despite the speed of the boat, it does not run back into it. Preparatory to the trip a plank is placed along the bottom, on which the passenger rests his feet while sitting single file on cross seats. When all is ready the spikes by which the boat is held while loading are pulled out, and away it goes on its fifty-two-mile journey, in some cases attaining the terrific velocity of seventy miles per hour.

The air is clear at Arequipa, Peru. From the observatory at that place, 8,050 feet above the sea, a black spot, one inch in diameter, placed on a white disc, has been seen on Mount Charcani, a distance of eleven miles, through a thirteen-inch telescope.

THE recent great operations in wheat caused a tremendous commotion in the market, and centered the eyes of the American and foreign speculators on this country's greatest cereal. Everybody has been talking about wheat, and that talk naturally drifts back to the corners in wheat that made all days Black Fridays for the men who engineered them. If all the wheat cornered in America were loaded into freight cars it would make a solid train that would reach from New York to Baltimore, or if piled into one pile it would be four times as high as the statue of liberty in New York harbor. It is a curious fact that never in the history of speculation, with one or two rare exceptions, has a big corner in wheat resulted in other than utter ruin for the men who planned it and carried out their ideas. The first really great corner in wheat was in 1872. It was engineer by Ira Y. Munn, J. B. Diamond and John B. Lyon & Co., and the field of operations was Chicago. It began in February, and did not come to an end until August. It was in May wheat, and the price ran from $1.15 in February up to $1.61 in August. Then it dropped, at first, 30 cents a bushel, and before the results of that corner were over, wheat was selling at 50 cents. Then there began to be stories about deception, and investigation proved that there were false bends in the elevators, as well as false bottoms. There were 10,000,000 bushels of wheat involved in this deal, the total value of which, at the highest point touched by wheat, was $16,100,000. The value of this wheat, when prices struck bottom, was $5,100,000, making the total loss to those who took part in the corner $11,000,000. Of course there were numerous little corners after this one, just as there are every year. People are ruined or made millionaires by wheat every season. It was not, however, until fully twenty years afterward that there was a corner in wheat of sufficient size to make the whole world talk. This is known as the Keene deal. There were involved in this corner 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, and when Mr. Keene had finished his costly amusement he was out just $7,000,000. This began in May, 1882, and continued until December. Wheat started at 91⅛, ran up to $1.40 and broke. The Western farmers broke Mr. Keene's corner, for they sent their wheat to market too quick for him. He found himself totally unable to handle it. In less than two months Mr. Keene dropped $13,000,000. John W. Mackay and James C. Flood in 1890 became the prime movers of a corner that lasted the longest of any in speculative history. It was two and a half years before the corner scheme was really ended. The total number of bushels involved in the corner was 9,000,000. The highest point in price reached during the progress of the corner was $1.08¼, in April, 1890. The lowest point touched was in October, 1892—69¼ cents. The total value of the wheat at the highest price reached was $10,650,000. Good judges place their loss at $2,600,000. In all the history of American speculation in the cereals, there never has been an instance where a corner brought ruin to so many persons as the now famous corner of 1887, in which the prime mover was Edward L. Harper, of Cincinnati, then the president of the Fidelity Bank. The first effort to form the corner was made March 15, 1887. Wheat at that time was selling at 70, and within the next ninety days steadily advanced until it reached 94¾ cents. June 15 came the break, and in almost the turn of a die, wheat dropped to 73. An idea of the tremendous excitement this occasioned may be formed from the fact that the total trading on the Chicago board that day amounted to 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. The trading in New York the same day was 30,000,000 bushels. The total loss to the Harper clique by the collapse of the corner was in round numbers $3,500,000. The total amount of wheat involved was 16,000,000 bushels. The sequel of this corner, so far as Harper is concerned, is a matter of criminal history. The ruin thus forced upon him disclosed the fact that he and one of his relatives had hypothecated the securities of the Fidelity Bank and robbed the depositors right and left. For this Harper was sent to the penitentiary. One of the most unusual corners was "Old Hutch's" last flurry on the Chicago board. It was not a preconceived affair. There was no more system in his speculations than there is ice in a great fire. His deals were the results of reckless plunges. His corners were formed on the impulse of the moment. That is just the way it was with his last corner, that of 1888, when he ran wheat up from 89¾ cents to $2, and cleared $3,000,000, although he only handled about 5,000,000 bushels of wheat. Old Hutch is one of the few, the very, very few, men who can say they ever made a cent out of a big corner in wheat.

ALL THE WHEAT EVER CORNERED WOULD EQUAL THIS PILE.

MOTTOES ON CHICKENS.

Long Island Farmer Sends His Neighbor's Fowls Home for Their Feed.

A good farmer near Sayville, L. I., takes great pride in his barnyard and in the chickens that feed therein. Of late he has been sorely distressed because of visitations to the barnyard of fowl belonging to his neighbors. The uninvited chickens would not only ruffle the feathers of those that were there by right, but would feed upon the corn that the good farmer threw to his feathered cratures with a liberal hand.

A PROBLEM.

Instead of attending meeting one Sunday recently the aggrieved farmer remained at home, determined to take radical steps to rid himself of trouble and his barnyard of his neighbors' chickens. He took a pint of corn and through the center of each kernel he bored a hole. Then he took some silken thread and fastened a short piece to each kernel. On the free ends of the thread he attached small slips of paper, on which, among other sentiments, was inscribed: "Trust in the Lord and feed your own hens," "We do not cast our bread upon the waters for broilers," "No free meal tickets," and "Please keep me at home and I'll not get in trouble." In due time the neighbor's chickens gathered in the good farmer's barnyard and swallowed the kernels to which the sentiments were attached. It didn't take those chickens that drew prizes long to reach their separate roosting places, and the town of Sayville was aroused by the sight of fowl making tracks through the byroads, while in their immediate wake fluttered slips of white paper. The good farmer's barnyard is now respected, but his chickens roost high.

THE CONSPIRACY.

RESULT.

"AIRY, FAIRY LILLIAN."

The Operatic Ex-Queen Who Knows Something About Matrimony.

Walter Jones, a comedian of minor degree, with a keen appreciation of advertising, astonished the theatrical world the other day by announcing that he was going to marry Lillian Russell, as soon as she could get a divorce from Signor Perugini. He was in St. Louis when he spoke and Lillian was far up in Iowa. Lillian reads the Sunday papers and before noon the next day she was out with the announcement that she wasn't going to marry any one. Thereupon Jones declared that the whole thing was a great mistake, but hinted that there would soon be a divorce.

Whatever the cause or the outcome of this much circulated rumor, one thing is certain. Matrimonial ventures are not novelties for Lillian. She has made three of them and all proved failures. If she tries another, it may be a success, for the fair singer's star is growing dim and her operatic career is drawing to a close. Once off the stage she may find a charm in domestic life.

Lillian is a Western product. She was born in Iowa in 1861 and her real name is Helen Louisa Leonard. Chicago was her girlhood home and her education was obtained in the Convent of the Sacred Heart in that city. As a girl she sang in church choirs and, like so many other future stars, her first stage success was achieved in amateur productions of Pinafore. In 1879 her professional career began in the same play under Ed Rice. Next she scintillated on Tony Pastor's stage in New York and her ballads made her so great a favorite that Col. McCaul made a financial ten-strike when he took her into his company as prima donna. Under him she became the acknowledged queen of comic opera. Then she formed her own company, which has since continued with more or less success.

Her beauty and graceful manner have not only made her a successful actress, but have also attracted lovers by the score. Many a heart has been shattered by her frown. Some have found favor, but her affection has never rested long on any one. Harry Braham, her musician, was the first man who led her to the altar. Wedded bliss was of short duration, and they separated. Teddy Solomon, the orchestra leader, next vowed eternal love to her at the altar, and for a time it looked like a happy match. But it was not, and they separated. Two years ago Signor Perugini, once common Jack Chatterton, married her, but again there was a separation, though no divorce has ever been obtained.

QUEER KIND OF BUNNIES.

They Inhabit the Lonely Faralione Islands.

A peculiar rabbit inhabits the Faralone islands. The material difference is that the bunnies of the islands eat raw fish and crabs, and have no special desire for green things. However, they do eat greens when they happen to find some. When the rabbits are eating the fish they look very much as they do when they are eating cabbage, and nibble it in the same way. They do not seem to be in the least particular as to the condition of the fish they are eating, and will make a meal off one that has lain on the rocks a week just as soon as from one that has just been washed ashore. It is interesting to know that the rabbits that live on the Farallones have contracted their present mode of living within the last thirty years, as they are the descendants of tame rabbits that were brought there by the first lighthouse-keepers. They are not as pretty as their ancestors. In fact, they have become very lean and haggard looking, and have much the appearance of a half-starved coyote. But the fact that they have adapted themselves to their new conditions is only another example to show that there is some foundation for the Darwinian theory.

RABBIT EATING A CRAB.

A Fatal Omelette.

Ignorance of cooking is not often the direct cause of a man's death, but such an instance is related by Miss Edith Lichel, in a recent volume entitled, "The Story of Two Salons." In the time of the French Revolution, one Monsieur Condorcet, upon whose head, as an aristocrat, a price was set, sought refuge with a friend, Monsieur Suard, who bade him return at nightfall, when means of escape would be provided.

Unhappily Condorcet, being unable to exist without tobacco, went into a tavern to buy some. Still prostrate from fatigue, he thought he would take advantage of this opportunity to get some dinner, and ordered an omelette.

"How many eggs do you wish to be used?" inquired the landlord, who had been eying him suspiciously. The innocent Condorcet was at his wits' ends; he reflected on the size of the ordinary omelette.

"Twelve," he boldly replied.

His fate was sealed; none but an aristocrat could he so ignorant or so extravagant. He was arrested and led away to prison, from which he never emerged.

Vices and Virtues of Chinatown.

If you made with me a complete tour of Chinatown, visiting every place where a Chinaman dwells, when you had returned you would sum up what you had seen about as follows:

Places where opium was smoked by Chinese in their own private apartments: about one-fourth of the whole.

Places where opium was sold to white visitors who smoked and slept on the premises, and which is commonly called an "opium joint": possibly three in your whole tour.

Places were gambling was in progress: about one-twentieth of the whole.

Places where men were pursuing the ordinary vocations of life: nearly three-fourths.—Century.

Our Kitchen

No kitchen is kept cleaner than the premises devoted to the manufacture of NONE SUCH Mince Meat. No housewife can be more fastidious in the matter of preparing food than we are in the selection and preparation of the materials of which it is made. The cleaning of the currants (for one thing) is more thoroughly done by means of perfected appliances, than it would be possible to do it by hand.

Its cleanliness, purity, wholesomeness and deliciousness are good reasons for using NONE SUCH Mince Meat. The best reason is its saving—of time, of hard work, of money. A ten cent package affords you two large pies, without trouble to you beyond the making of the crust. Makes just as good fruit cake and fruit pudding as it does mince pie. Sold everywhere. Be sure and get the genuine.

Send your name and address, and mention this paper, and we will mail you free a book—"Mrs. Popkins' Thanksgiving"—by one of the most famous humorous authors of the day.

Epilepsy 20 Years.

Cured by Dr. Miles' Nervine.

A few years ago, Mr. L. W. Gallaher, was an extensive, successful expert manufacturer of lumber products. Attacked with epilepsy, he was obliged to give up his business. The attacks came upon him most inopportunely. One time falling from a carriage, at another down stairs, and often in the street. Once he fell down a shaft in the mill, his injuries nearly proving fatal. Mr. Gallaher writes from Milwaukee, Feb. 16, '95.

"There are none more miserable than epileptics. For 20 years I suffered with epileptic fits, having as high as five in one night. I tried any number of physicians, paying to one alone, a fee of $500.00 and have done little for years but search for something to help me, and have taken all the leading remedies, but received no benefit. A year ago my son, Chas. S. Gallaher, druggist at 191 Reed St., Milwaukee, gave me Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine, and I tried it with gratifying results. Have had but two fits since I began taking it. I am better now in every way than I have been in 20 years."

Dr. Miles' Remedies are sold by druggists on a positive guarantee that the first bottle will benefit or price refunded. Book on the Heart and Nerves, free. Address,

To Subscribers.

Subscribers to the Weekly COURIER are getting careless and allowing their dues to get way behind. This is not wisdom nor justice. It will be wise to keep it from getting too big, and justice to the printer who always has use for the money. We do not complain of those who find it hard work to get the money. But we have several hundred who are able to pay and they should see to it without delay. They could attend to this when they come to pay taxes. Let us hear from you.

Venezuela.

It is reliably stated that the United States has fully gained all he started out to get, in settling the Venzuelan matter. It is now certain that not only is the right of Uncle Sam to interfere between European nations, and those of South America, but it is condeded that we can act for them and they not be called in at all. This astonishing thing has just happened, Great Britain and the United States have conducted these negotiations alone, and have them about finished so as to settle the boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, and Venezuela has had nothing to do with it, except to furnish the evidence in part.

Coal Oil War.

Down at Peru the people are enjoying a coal oil war. The fight is one between a grocer and the Standard Oil Co. Thursday the grocer dropped the price of oil from 10 cents to 7 cents per gallon and a couple of days later the Standard Oil Co. cut to 5 cents per gallon. It is expected that oil will sell at 2 cents before the war is over.

WATERLOO.

The new town hall and opera house, is a fine building, and with good weather a short time will be enclosed and safe for the workmen to finish the interior. Picker & Bumpus did the brickwork, and Sol Shearer has the carpenter work to do.

Mr. Kagey, the miller, will move into Hez. Leas' residence, as soon as the latter gets into the new home at the Bank.

—The new gristmill near the Jackson road north of the old Boozer home, is doing a fine business. It has all the latest machinery, and makes first-class flour.

Uncle John Leas still gets over town now and then, though he is pretty feeble.

—Will Fisher started southward Thursday afternoon, on his usual trips.

—Lee stamets is putting in new cement walk along both sides of his property and no one in town will have nicer.

Speer & Co. are showing a fine line of crockery and china in addition to their other goods. They will make this a special feature of the holiday trade.

The COURIER reporter met Ed. Blattner on the train Thursday on the Grand Rapids road. He was working his way southward. He is the picture of good health but Mrs. B. is not in the best of health nor has she been for some time. A call at Kendallville, gave us a visit with James Taylor, who has been for several years in charge of the Kendallville pumping station for Lake Shore road.

H. K. Leas has moved into the new brick building, where the bank is to occupy the front part. The dwelling is at the rear, and also occupies the second floor. It is fitted up elegantly with all modern improvements including a heater in the basement and will make an elegant home.

—The next room in the new block to the south of the Citizens Bank room, is the Oddfellows room, which is to be occupied by J. D. Campbell as a drugstore, with the lodge room above. The next south is the meat market of of Swartz Brothers, and is one of the most complete we ever saw. They have the most modern style of meat cutter and a fine new engine. It will be soon be ready to occupy. The next south of this is J. C. Boyer's new room which is being rapidly fitted up for him. Then comes D. L. Leas' room which he has occupied for a month or so. The next is the corner room belonging to Dr. Darby. We do not know what is to be in the main room, but toward the rear are the rooms for barber shops or offices. The east room in the corner, is again occupied by the postoffice, which has been there so long till driven out by the fire. All along in front of the block and on the south side, is a new cement walk making it uniform all along. It is all a great improvement, and the block is a beauty.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

No Landslide.

—Republican papers would do well to stop talking about their "landslide." Several states went democratic that never did before, and in many cases the republican majorities were reduced. A small list of close states can be selected, which if 25,000 voters were changed from one side to the other, the whole list would be democratic and Bryan would be elected instead of McKinley. No, it is very far from a landslide, for it is admitted by all, that the gold democrats, few as they were, held the balance of power, and by voting for McKinley, gave him the office. So it don't look much like a walk-a-way.

Growing Children

One-third of all the children die before they are five years old. Most of them die of some wasting disease. They grow very slowly; keep thin in flesh; are fretful; food does not do them much good. You can't say they have any disease, yet they never prosper. A slight cold, or some stomach and bowel trouble takes them away easily.

SCOTT'S EMULSION of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites is just the remedy for growing children. It makes hard flesh; sound flesh; not soft, flabby fat. It makes strong bones, healthy nerves. It changes poor children to children rich in prosperity.

Book about it free for the asking.

Vote For Postmaster

LOCAL ELECTIONS WILL BE HELD THEN CONGRESSMEN WILL RECOMMEND.

The Indiana republican congressmen-elect have decided to refer all applications for postoffice appointments to the patrons of the postoffices, and elections will be held in every city and town of the state after March 4. The congressmen-elect have hit upon this plan to avoid the responsibility of making appointments themselves and will recommend no one who has not received a majority of the votes of the republican patrons of the office to which he aspires. The republican senator to be elected by the coming legislature will dispense the patronage in the four districts which will be represented by democrats.

Too many congressmen have met their Waterloo by making a postoffice appointment. It used to turn down the congressman every time in the old Crawfordsville district and it beat McNagny two years ago in this district, when he had 4,000 Democratic majority to go on. Hon. J. D. Leighty, Rep., had 3,000 majority. It is these facts of history which are confronting the Indiana delegation.

A School Pamphlet

Copies Now Being Sent to Members of the Legislature.

Superintendent of Public Instruction Geeting has prepared in pamphlet form recommendations relating to the public schools which he is sending to the members elect of the next legislature. It is in part as follows:

"That a law be enacted making i the duty of township trustees, and the trustees of town and city schools, to furnish high school accommodations, free, to all graduates from the common branches.

"That a law be enacted making it the duty of the superintendent of public instruction to examine all teachers for public schools of the state, thereby making the license valid in any part of the state, instead of in one county, as at present.

"That there be a law enacted providing for the qualification of county and city superintendents.

"That an enabling act be passed enlarging the work of the state library board (instituted by the general assembly of 1895) whereby a district library system may be established, extending the privilege of reading good books to children in our country, village and town schools.

"That the state board of education be authorized to recognize state certificates issued in other states."

Not Good at Figgers.

The Dispatch seems to have lost its balance wheel. In its last issue, it has put up into a table a lot of irrelevant figures that it is trying to palm off on an innocent public as a reliable tabular statement of DeKalb county's vote at the late lamented election. It proudly calls attention to it, in the following note.

"We want to repeat that the official tabular vote in this issue of the Dispatch is correct. That published by Barns in his COURIER is incorrect, and consequently worthless. This table will be used as a basis for delegates to the various conventions in 1900, and if incorrect some townships will get more or less delegates than they are entitled to."

After reading this buncombe, we naturally turn to their "correct" table to see how his figures pan out anyhow: Omitting numerous inaccuracies in the body of it, we call attention to the footings that should show the majorities. First as to the vote for president, we find it gives Bryan's total vote at 3678, and McKinley's at 3137; and gives Bryan's plurality as 552.

Now in order to get this difference between 3678 and 3137, it substracts as follows: 7 from 8 leaves 2; 3 from 7 leaves 5; and 1 from 6 leaves 5.

On governor, we find like brilliant work; thus Shively gets 3572; Mounts, 3116. Then comes the subtracting; 6 from 12 leaves 7; 2 from 7 leaves 2; 1 from 5 leaves 3. This gives his plurality for Mount, 327.

On congressman, the figuring is equally "correct," thus: Robinson, 3580; Leighty, 3170. The subtracting shows: 0 from 0 leaves 9; 7 from 8 leaves 8; 1 from 5 leaves 4. This gives in their way, Robinson's plurality at 489.

On prosecutor they have: 5 from 7 leaves 3; 3 from 12 leaves 7; 1 from 5 leaves 4.

On senator they have: 0 from 7 leaves 0; 3 from 4 leaves 0; 1 from 5 leaves 5.

Representative they say: 3 from 7 leaves 4; 0 from 5 leaves 0; 1 from 5 leaves 5.

Joint representative, it stands: 7 from 10 leaves 2; 8 from 14 leaves 4; 2 from 5 leaves 4.

Treasurer, they say: 2 from 2 leaves 3; 3 from 3 leaves 4; 1 from 5 leaves 4.

On sheriff they subtract; 5 from 5 leaves 3; 7 from 14 leaves 1; 3 from four leaves 1.

Surveyor gets this: 3 from 6 leaves 5; 8 from 10 leaves 9; 3 from 5 leaves 2.

Assessor has this subtraction: 4 from 6 leaves 3; 5 from 10 leaves 8; 2 from 5 leaves 3.

Commissioner S. E. shows; 4 from 12 leaves 6; 4 from 11 leaves 2; 3 from 5 leaves 3.

Commissioner S. W. has: 9 from 17 leaves 4; 1 from 3 leaves 6; 2 from leaves 2.

Coroner gets this subtraction: 8 from 11 leaves 2; 4 from 11 leaves 0; 24 from 5 leaves 4.

Now who says "figgers wont lie?" If the whole table is like its footings it will be safe to put off further consideration of it till "the various conventions in 1900."

A Queer Organization.

Avilla News.

There exists in Ligonier a very unique organization of men, the like of which is not known in the United States. Twenty years ago, ten young men, the sons of prominent business men, organized themselves into a society, the name of which is the A. S. A. They were joined together by the usual solemnity of an oath, and the organization was created to exist until there was but one member living. The last survivor, or the nigh of the annual banquet, which commemorates each year of the society's existence, is to have plates laid for ten, eat his supper alone and thus end the organization. All members are now married, and since the organization twenty years ago there has been but one of the mystic circle taken away by death —Ferdinand Sandrock, who died at Valparaiso in 1892. It has been the custom on the 11th day on January of each year to have a banquet, and this has been kept up during the entire term of its existence. January 11, 1897, will be celebrated as the twenty-first anniversary. These banquets are elaborate, and the society numbers among its members residents of Chicago, Toledo and other cities. The loyalty and fidelity exhibited by its members is equal to that displayed by any fraternal or beneficial organization in existence. It needs no stretch of imagination to picture the gloom and sadness that will necessarily fall on the mind of the member who partakes of the last supper alone. It is the wish of each of the members that he may not be left to be participant in the final banquet. A loving cup, which is handsomely designed, and upon which the name of each member is engraved, and the date of the formation of the society, will be kept by the surviving member of the final banquet. The organization has gained a reputation for its hospitality and the manner of entertaining its friends. It has but recently been made public that the organization is to continue until there is but one member living. The nine remaining members are C. E. Braden, now of Chicago, N. S. Knepper, Toledo, Lon D. Fleming, Dr. W. A. Shobe, W. A. Sisterhen, M. S. Hutchison, G. M. Zimmerman and Chas. H. Shobe.

Horrible! Horrible!

Innocent children by the thousand are constantly dying of diarrhœa whose life might be saved. How quickly the demon works! Flesh speedily wastes away as though subjected to fire. You try change of water, and change of food and change of air. The handiest and quickest and safest thing you can do is to procure at once a bottle of Dr. Hand's Diarrhœa Mixture, at any drug store, for 25c. It's wonderful how quickly it brings good results. Fischler & Son.

More Silver

The mints have coined sixteen millions of silver dollars in the past nine months. The silver agitation has done that much good, anyhow. But why did not these officers get a hustle on themselves sooner, and not wait till the people were out of patience with them. And "how will government be able to keep the silver dollars at par, if the amount coined, is increased?" This question was fired at silver men, all through the campaign by those who believed in gold alone, and who claimed if more dollars were coined they could not be kept at par. But they will now see that in spite of this rapid increase every silver dollar will go at par. It would have been so had Bryan been elected.

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg. Pa., and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf

Wanted Much.

IS A E. HALIBACH WHO WAS ARRESTED AT AUBURN LAST WEEK.

A. E. Halibach, the man who was arrested at Auburn Junction last week by the deputy marshal of Garrett and brought to the jail here by Marshal West and later taken to Ft. Wayne by Deputy United States Marshal Wiley, is a very much wanted man. He was arrested on the charge of impersonating a United States government officer, but the evidence in this case is defective and will not be prosecuted. But he is also wanted by parties at Logansport, Ft. Wayne, Bucyrus and Findlay, Ohio, Peru, Indianapolis, South Chicago and Lafayette for forging checks. He was taken from Ft. Wayne to Logansport where he will be given another hearing. The accused has lived in the Pixley-Long block Ft. Wayne with his wife and daughter for some time past.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. Dr. J. J. Littlefield

Graphic, Monte Vista, Col.

Dr. John J. Littlefield died at his residence on Euclid avenue, Monte Vista, at 1 o'clock this morning of typhoid pneumonia after a brief illness. His funeral will be conducted to-morrow at 10 o'clock by Rev. Mr Betcher from the Christian church and his remains will be interred in the Soldier's Home cemetery. Dr. Littlefield and family moved to Monte Vista during the summer from Duncan and in the short time he had been here he has made many friends. He served during the war in the 18th and 24th regiments of Michigan Infantry; in the former as a private and in the latter as assistant surgeon.

Dr. Littlefild was born in Oneida, N. Y., March 13. 1831 and was a member of the Christian church. Since his arrival in Monte Vista he has been a member of the choir of that church. He was a graduate of the Michigan State and the Philadelphia Medical colleges and a physician and surgeon of wide practice and marked ability. He leaves a wife and two children to mourn the loss of a devoted husband and kind father while the community recognizes the loss of a most worthy citizen.

Baked Argument.

When you buy crackers don't take the dealer's word for too much—taste them and let their flavor argue their merits. When you do this there isn't a doubt but that you will select Fox's XXXX Square Wafer Butter Cracker.

Conditional Orders.

In the heat of the campaign matters we forgot to make notice that we had received one of those "conditional orders," conditional on the result of the election, which manufacturers, jobbers and merchants have been saying so much about. Printed at the bottom, in red ink were the words:

"It is also agreed that should the Free Silver Candidate Bryan be elected this Co. have the privilege of cancelling this contract."

We allow them to "cancel" as McKinley was elected. And besides, it is our opinion that a company that has no more business sense than that don't know enough to make pills that are capable of doing their plain duty.

My Baby.

THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

The Latest News as Flashed Over the Wires from All Parts of the World—Regarding Politics, Religion, Casualties, Commerce, and Industry.

FOUGHT WITH BANDITS.

Killing of the Notorious Bob Hayes—Battle with His Desperate Band.

Separ (N. M.) special: Deputy United States Marshal McGillichy, has had a fight with Black Jack's bandits, killing the notorious Bob Hayes, and wounding George Misgrove, alias Jeff Davis, who escaped. None of the posse were injured. Black Jack, Frank Anderson, Bill George and another escaped, and the posse is in pursuit. The fight occurred at Deer Creek, about thirty miles south of Separ, off the Southern Pacific road. This is said to be the most desperate gang that ever infested New Mexico. Their operations began July last, since which time they have held up Separ twice, the White Oak stage, robbing the mail four times; Nogale's Bank, Teviston postoffice, San Simon postoffice, station and store; Stein's station, Central postoffice; attempted to hold up a mail train on the Atlantic and Pacific road, in which their leader, Cole Young, was killed. During their reign of terror they have killed four men—Robinson, the line rider, who, with a posse, pursued them after the attempted bank robbery at Nogales; Parker, a ranchman, near Rosewater, N. M., and a rancher and cowboy in the Animas valley.

A Boat and Crew Lost.

News from Honolulu, per steamer Alameda to San Francisco, says: The Norwegian bark Seladon, with sixteen men, is believed to be at the bottom of the ocean. Wilder & Co., coal merchants, to whom her cargo was consigned, have given her up. The bark was 1,066 tons, and sailed from New Castle, July 13, last, for Honolulu. She is now 116 days out, and has never been heard of. The engineers here believe she has either burned or gone to the bottom.

A Lone Highwaymen.

Decatur (Ind.) special: A loan highwaymen, with a pair of revolvers, stopped a section gang on a hand car on the G. R. & I. Railroad and held them up for over one hundred dollars. There were four men and they had just received their last month's salary. The highwayman compelled them to throw their money on the track, mount their car and leave. Officers were notified and posses are out after the robber.

Deadly Plague.

The steamer Olympia, which has arrived at Tacoma, Wash., from Hong Kong, brought news that passengers from Bombay to Europe will probably have to undergo quarrantine on their arrival at European ports on account of the plague. The latest news is that the scourge is spreading, seventeen new cases and eight deaths having occurred in the northern part of the city.

Disastrous Freight Wreck.

A broken axle caused a disastrous freight wreck on the Bald Eagle road at Unionville, eight miles west of Bellefonte, Pa. Sixteen cars were demolished and Dorry Baney, aged 22 years, of that place was killed. Clem Stevenson, aged 20 years, of Osceola, had his legs cut off and will die. The victims were stealing a ride on the train.

Goes Up for Prize Fighting.

Springfield (Ohio) special: Earl A. Moore was taken to the Penitentiary to serve one year for prize fighting. He is said to be the first person ever sent to the Penitentiary for prize fighting, where neither of the participants was injured or killed. John Jenkins, Moore's antagonist, fled and thus escaped prosecution.

Attempt to Burn Danville, Ky.

John R. Gentry, the fastest pacer in the world, was sold for $19,100 at Madison Square Garden, New York City. His record is 2:00¾, his race record 2:01¾.

EASTERN.

The Hartford Carpet Company, Thompsonville, Conn., gave employment Monday to 100 additional men, making the total number of employes between 300 and 400. A portion of the mills runs on full-time schedule and the rest three days a week.

The New York World says: "The aggregate of election expenses was close to $4,000,000. Mark Hanna had about $1,500,000 at his command. It cost about $1,400,000 to elect McKinley, and there was about $75,000 left in the treasury. Almost all the Republican fund came from the East, New York giving $500,000, Philadelphia $475,000, Pittsburg $250,000, and Boston $162,000. Over $60,000 a week was paid for postage, most all of it through the Chicago headquarters. The Democratic national fund was nearly $1,500,000. The five silver-producing States and the mine owners raised three-fourths of all the money Chairman Jones spent."

A test Monday of four of the five eight-inch disappearing guns at Fort Wadsworth, made it clear that if a fleet of Spanish warships intent on wiping New York off the map should get past Sandy Hook they would be full of holes before they reached the Narrows. In testing the guns everything was done as in war except the target was a sheet of canvas. The guns are up-to-date weapons. Each weighs 32,180 pounds and is 23.20 feet long. At the effective target distance of three and a half miles their shells would penetrate nine inches. The projectiles weigh 300 pounds and the charge is 105 pounds of powder. The markmanship was effective and the disappearing carriages thrown back by the recoil worked almost perfectly.

WESTERN.

Public schools have been closed at Galesburg and Ramsey because of the spread of diphtheria.

From unofficial sources it is learned that the woman suffrage amendment to the Idaho constitution has a majority of nearly 5,000.

The twenty-eighth annual reunion of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee was held in St. Louis. The annual address was delivered by Gen. O. O. Howard.

E. S. Holden, director of the Lick Observatory, San Francisco, has received from the minister of foreign affairs of Denmark the decoration of Knight of the Royal Order of the Dannebrog. This ancient order was founded in 1219, and is conferred in the present case for services to science.

Mrs. Foley, a widow aged 65, and her unmarried daughter Fanny, aged 40, were found murdered in their home near Liberty, Mo., early Wednesday morning. No motive for the crime is known. Mother and sister were found in their bedroom dressed in their nightgowns and bespattered with blood. The daughter lay upon the floor, her head resting against the bed, and the mother was stretched out face downward beside her. They had both been shot, the mother through the head and the daughter in the back. Further investigation showed that the assassin or assassins had fired at Mrs. Foley through one of the front windows. The bullet lodged in the head of the bedstead. Both women evidently became frightened and ran into the bedroom in the rear. The door was then forced open and the bloody work completed.

Mrs. Mary P. Stevens, of Yale, Ill., chaplain of the Rebekah Grand Lodge, fell to the floor unconscious while opening the morning session of the lodge at Springfield, Ill., Wednesday, and died ten minutes later. Nothing more startling ever occurred in a session of the Grand Lodge. The Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows was in session in the Hall of Representatives, and the Rebekah Grand Lodge, the women's branch of the order, had chosen the Senate chamber for the place of their deliberations. Mrs. Stevens' husband, D. G. Stevens, a prominent business man of Yale, has been connected with the Odd Fellows for many years, and has become a familiar figure at every session of the Grand Lodge. His allegiance to the principles of the order had been shared by his wife, who, for more than half of the sixty years of her life, had done all she could to advance the women's branch of the three-link fraternity. Mrs. Stevens had filled successively every office in the subordinate lodge. She was regarded as one of the leading women among the Daughters of Rebekah in Illinois, and had been chosen by her sisters to the lofty office of chaplain of the Grand Lodge.

Chief of Police Lepinski returned to Hastings, Neb., Tuesday morning from Hanover, Kan., where he traced the Davenport, Neb., bank robbers, and succeeded in unearthing an organized gang of the boldest kind of robbers which has been operating through the State for the last six months. Saturday morning the Bank of Davenport was robbed of everything in the safe, which amounted to several thousand dollars. The work was proven to be done by professionals. Chief Lepinski got onto their track and followed them to Hanover, Kan., where he arrested three of them. In searching a cellar the officer dug up about $500 in gold, $300 in silver, plenty of gold watches and jewelry, besides a large roll of scrip and several dynamite bombs. Among the silverware found was that which was taken from the Davenport bank, with the banker's name engraved. The fellows, when searched, had upon their persons $1,300 in currency, several large revolvers, and four large stillettos. The three robbers were taken to Washington, Kan., to await their trial. It is thought that this is the most thoroughly organized gang of thieves that has ever existed in the West.

SOUTHERN.

Michael O'Connor, formerly of Chicago, was murdered by a negro at Jackson, Miss.

In celebrating McKinley's victory at Clintwood, Dickson County, Va., an anvil exploded, killing Pellam Cooley and Preston Mullins and frightfully injuring three others.

All toll gates in Woodford County, Kentucky, were cut down and destroyed by a mob Wednesday night. Similar depredations have been committed recently in Franklin, Owen, Anderson and Washington Counties. The mobs are composed of men who demand free turnpikes in Kentucky.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock Sunday night a lynching party visited the county jail at Farmville, Va., and attempted to take the life of Elisha Johnson, colored, awaiting trial for an assault and highway robbery alleged to have been committed Tuesday night upon a white man named "Wax" Price. There were in the party a half-dozen determined men, one of whom climbed the jail fence and, unhooking the gate, admitted the others. The prisoner was confined in a lower floor cell. The would-be lynchers opened fire through the bars upon the prisoner, who was lying upon his couch, paralyzed from fright. He could not be seen well through the window and cell bars, and only one load of shot took effect. His wounds are not serious. Johnson, it is alleged, waylaid "Wax" Price near Price's depot, and struck him on the head and robbed him. Price's injuries are not serious, and there is much surprise that an attempt at lynching was made.

WASHINGTON.

Ex-Congressman Forman of Illinois has formally accepted appointment to the office of commissioner of internal revenue.

A Washington dispatch says that the inauguration of William McKinley will be made the occasion of the greatest military display since the grand review at the close of the civil war. Every State in the Union is preparing to send a large delegation of militia to take part in the big military parade.

The United States Supreme Court has rendered an opinion sustaining the constitutionality of the Wright irrigation law of California and overruling the decision of the United States Circuit Court for the California district which was against the law's validity. The case in which the opinion was rendered was that of the Fall Brook Irrigation Company vs. Maria King Bradley. It has attracted widespread interest throughout the Rocky Mountains and Pacific coast regions because of its importance to the material interests of the entire arid belt, and in the central West and East the suit gained prominence through the fact that ex-President Harrison was of counsel.

Commissioner of Labor Carroll D. Wright has made a special report on the statistics of occupation. The figures are as follows: "There were 22,735,661 persons 10 years of age and over engaged in gainful occupations in 1890, of whom 18,821,090 were males and 3,914,571 females. Of these 3,013,117 males and 510,613 females, or a total of 3,523,730 persons, were employed at their principal occupations during some part of the census year ending May 31, 1890. Of the whole number of persons so unemployed 1,818,865 were unemployed from one to three months, 1,368,418 from four to six months, and 336,447 from seven to twelve months. This is equivalent, approximately, to 1,139,672 persons unemployed at their occupation for the entire twelve months."

FOREIGN.

It is understood that the next step in the Venezuelan affair will be that Venezuela will empower her plenipotentiary to settle and sign with the British plenipotentiary a treaty referring the boundary dispute to arbitration. It is suggested that the treaty will be signed in Washington.

The Provisional Government of the Cuban rebel republic, through its delegation in New York, has sent to the Ministers in Washington of the different Spanish-American republics an appeal, addressed "to the republics of Latin-America," for transmission to their respective governments. The appeal is signed by Salvator Cisneros Betancourt, president, and Rafael M. Portuondo, secretary of foreign affairs.

The London Standard's correspondent at Berlin says: "According to the Frankfurter Zeitung negotiations continue between the United States and Germany regarding German imports of wine and malt liquors, presumably in connection with the propsal of Mr. Morton, Secretary of Agriculture, to exclude adulterated articles, which is a retort to the German exclusion of American cattle and meat. The whole question will probably be discussed in the Reichstag."

Consul General Maratta, writing to the Department of State from Melbourne, on the mint returns for the quarter ended Sept. 30, says they are of much interest in connection with the gold discoveries in the colony of West Australia. Almost all the gold produced in that colony is brought to the Melbourne mint. For the first nine months of the current year the mint received only 152,259 ounces of gold from Western Australia against 160,949 last year, a decrease of 8,690 ounces. Victoria has, up to the present time, supplied 580,330 ounces, against 526,570 for the corresponding period of 1895, and if the same rate of increase is continued the production of the colony for 1896 will be about 775,000 ounces. Imports of gold from New Zealand and Tasmania show large increases, but much has been received from South Australia. The total quantity of gold received by the mint from January to September, this year, is 857,641 ounces, against 785,752 for the corresponding period last year.

IN GENERAL.

By a unanimous vote the directors of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company have ordered the building of a new steamer. The ship will fly the American flag and will be available for use as a Government transport. She is to be 7,000 tons burden and capable of making not less than sixteen knots an hour. This steamer is to be used in the China trade of the line.

Rev. B. D. Mackay, of Toronto, Ontario, foreign secretary of the Presbyterian church, has received a letter from one of the missionaries in India, which tells a terrible tale of distress and suffering because of the failure of the wheat crop in that country. People are on the verge of starvation, parents are selling their children for bread, while some are leaving them to perish of want.

W. J. Bryan is actively engaged in the preparation of a work to be published about Jan 1. This work will embody a thorough discussion of bimetallism and its importance as an issue in the campaign of 1900. Mr. Bryan has authorized his publishers to announce that one-half of the royalties received from the sale of the book will be used in advancing the cause of bimetallism during the next four years. The work will also contain Mr. Bryan's views regarding the results of the recent campaign, his biography, written by his wife, together with special contributions from eminent political leaders. Another special feature of the work will be an interesting account of Mr. Bryan's trip and the enthusiastic receptions accorded him.

DUNKARDS IN DAKOTA

LARGE COLONIES OF THESE PEOPLE SETTLING THERE.

As a Land of Promise the Country Seems to Meet with Their Favor—An Honest, Industrious and Thrifty Class of Citizens.

Given Cordial Welcome.

The counties of Eddy and Foster, in North Dakota, possess a particular interest from the fact that they have become, during the past two years, a great field for settlement by colonies of Dunkards, who came from Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and other States to make new homes upon the North Dakota prairies. The Dunkards are nearly all farmers, and very good farmers, too. They pay their debts promptly and seldom have recourse to the processes of law. They do not, as a rule, take part in politics, but they usually vote at national elections where the questions at issue are such as interest them profoundly.

The movement for a settlement of large colonies of these excellent people in North Dakota originated with the railroad companies operating lines in that State. It was taken up with interest in a number of large Dunkard communities, and delegates were sent out to examine the land and report upon its fertility, upon the climate, and upon the transportation and school facilities. The favorable reports of these delegates led a large number of families to sell out their farms and migrate to the new lands of the Northwest. They in turn sent back good accounts to their relatives and neighbors, and the result was a still larger movement of colonization.

The Dunkards found in North Dakota all the advantage of cheap lands which belongs to a new country, and, at the same time, the many advantages of railways, towns, schools, churches and roads which belong to a reign of long-established settlement. They were not slow to see the opportunity afforded them for opening farms on good prairie land that could be bought for $3 to $5 an acre, and in many localities could be obtained from the United States Government at only the small cost of the land office fees required by the homestead low. Undoubtedly the success of the settlements of these people, already established and prosperous, will lead to a further movement of their co-religionists the ensuing spring and summer. The people of North Dakota are giving a cordial welcome to the Dunkards. They recognize their value as citizens of the new commonwealth. They are honest, industrious and thrifty. They build good houses and cultivate their lands carefully. They know how to take care of cattle and sheep. They know the economic value of gardens of vegetables and small fruits. They conscientiously pay their debts, go to church every Sunday, and send their children to school. They have, in fact, all the good qualities of the best class of agricultural settlers.

Meet to Give Thanks.

It was a memorable occasion that called these sturdy settlers together in Carrington, N. D., on the 6th of September, 1896. Scarce half a year had elapsed since a hundred or more families, comprising about 50 souls, left their old homes in Eastern States to settle on the fertile lands which lie contiguous to the Northern Pacific Railway in the counties of Foster, Eddy and Wells. But they had been six months of progress. Homes had been built, broad fields placed under cultivation, and, side by side with these evidences of material prosperity was the prompt construction of a church—wherein they might assemble to return humble but devout thanksgiving to the God they worshiped. Beautiful in its simplicity, the little church about which they gathered and in which they reverently assembled, stood as a sign before heaven and unto men. It was a token of faith—of faith out there on the great Dakota prairies—the faith of a people who desired nothing better than to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows and to live at peace with the whole world.

In one respect at least Dunkards resemble bees, viz: They colonize together and stay together as long as the country can afford them all a good living, and then, when it becomes too narrow for them, they swarm, and the younger generation makes a new beginning in some less thickly populated locality. This swarming process is now in full blast in many parts of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and other States even further East, and of the lands of promise selected for future operations, none seems to be meeting with greater favor than North Dakota, as is witnessed by the steady stream that has been filtering through St. Paul in that direction for some time past. This is not an evidence that North Dakota is a better State than those to the immediate east of its borders, but it has more available land open for settlement under such conditions as render it a desirable place for a new colony.

At first the stream went north to the free Government land around Devil's Lake and that region, but latterly the tide has turned further to the south, and the country where the Northern Pacific and the Soo intersect has been receiving a considerable impetus owing to the fact that it has the additional boon of railroad competition, while in no other respect does it come behind the most favored portions of the State. The soil of course is practically the same, and whatever difference there may be in climate is naturally in favor of the more southern location, while in the matter of land available for settlement it is easily in the lead, having as much Government land open for settlement, and as many farms awaiting tenants on the crop-payment plan as any other part of North Dakota, while the recent placing on the market of a large tract of railroad land in the Northern Pacific indemnity belt, afforded that company the opportunity for which it was looking, to take a hand in this business, and it at once embraced this chance by setting aside three townships of land for the exclusive use of the brethren, and further than this the offer was made that when a certain number of families settled in a given locality, a donation of $500 would be made towards the erection of a church of their own belief. The soil has proved more fertile than anything they had ever dreamed of, the ease with which farming is carried on has almost taken their breath away, and the climate, so absolutely pure and free from all traces of malaria, has given a new zest to living.

Origin of the Sect.

The term "Dunkard" is applied to a sect of German-American Baptists said to have been founded at Schwarzenau, in Westphalia, by Alexander Mack in 1708. The name is derived from their manner of baptism—by trine immersion. They were driven from Germany in 1719-29, and crossed the ocean and settled in Pennsylvania—subsequently in Ohio, Indiana, Maryland, Virginia and other States. Properly speaking, they ought always to be referred to as German Baptists; but owing to their method of baptism they have been called "Dunkers," "Dunkards" and "Tunkers"—from the German tunken, "to dip." They have been called "Dunkards" so long and so universally, however, that it seems best to continue the usage. The term really has no other signification than that of the word Baptist in English, so there can be no possible disrespect in employing it.

There are about 250,000 Dunkards in the United States, nearly 2,500 of them being in North Dakota. They are good Americans and the very best of colonizers. They have founded six self-supporting colleges, have a church paper that is ably edited and widely circulated, and among them are many highly-educated men—men of letters and broad scholastic attainments. One of these brethren, the Elder D. L. Miller, has made several tours of the Holy Land and has written a number of works which entitle him to a high rank in the world of letters.

SAILS SKYWARD FEET FIRST.

Frightful Balloon Experience of a Man in Georgia.

Will Whitfield, a bricklayer of Rome, Ga., is probably the only man who ever went 3,000 feet up in the air feet foremost. His perilous adventure took place in Birmingham. Prof. McSheen was to make a balloon ascension and parachute leap and a large crowd had assembled to see the ascent. Young Whitfield, rather awkward and boyish, was among the sightseers and helped to adjust and steady the ropes that confined the airship to the earth. He is about 25 years of age, and over 6 feet high, tall and gaunt. When the balloon was sufficiently inflated and the gearing of the parachute properly arranged, the order came to let go, and as it shot upward a wild cry of horror went out from the spectators. Dangling by a three-eighths-inch rope attached to the balloon was the diminishing form of Whitfield, whirling around as the balloon swayed, head downward, hanging by one foot between the balloon and the appended parachute.

"I must have been standing with my right foot in a noose in the end of the rope," said Whitfield, in speaking of his experience. "At any rate, as the balloon shot up the loop caught around my ankle and so quickly was it done that I was jerked clear of the ground and straight up without my head striking as I tripped. The balloon must have shot directly upward, as we were carried safely between the wires of a network of telegraph poles without touching them. I must have been a thousand feet from the earth when I recovered consciousness. You see, the sudden jerk took my breath away and the ascent was so rapid that I was high in the air before I realized what had happened. My body was twirling around and around and the air rushed past me like a hurricane, while the pain in my ankle was agonizing. At last I observed a rope that hung down from the balloon within my reach, and I reached out my hand and grasped it. The Professor told me to climb up and get into the nest of ropes that formed a network below the car and to fix myself firmly there, where I would be perfectly safe. About the time I got myself firmly fixed in my airy seat I heard him calling me again. He was telling me that he was going to cut loose the parachute and for me not to grow alarmed and lose my grip on the ropes. In a few minutes the balloon suddenly shot upward at a fearful rate, and looking down I saw the parachute sailing off and descending like a bird. I clutched the ropes still more firmly and soon realized that the balloon was drawing near the earth. Lower and lower the balloon drifted until it reached the outskirts of the town, when the trailing ropes were caught by the people below and it was brought to a standstill. You never heard such a cheer in all your life as those people set up as I touched the ground. Men and women laughed and cried and hugged me as though I had been their nearest and dearest relative. They helped me untangle myself and carried me uptown on their shoulders. I was never made so much of in my life before nor since. But I lived about 100 years on that trip and all the money in the world would not tempt me to repeat it."

Why She Knew Better than Mamma.

Mrs. Elizabeth W. Champney, of New York, has a beautiful little story to tell of the Junior League of Patrons and Patronesses which is working for the Messiah Home for Little Children.

Said mamma: "Gladys, you must not sit on the stone steps, you will take cold."

"Oh, no, mamma, I will not take cold."

"Gladys, mammas know better than little girls."

"Oh, no, mamma. For mammas and little girls are both from God, and little girls came later and so have the latest news."

Our Enormous Tobacco Crop.

Tobacco is one of our great money crops, says Frank G. Carpenter, and it brings us millions of dollars in gold from Europe every year. It amounts at times to almost as much as the product of our gold mines. In 1893 it sold for more than $39,000,000, and in 1894 about $27,000,000. Of this last amount $23,000,000 was sold to Europe, Asia, Africa and South America, and the most of it was composed of tobacco leaves packed up for shipment almost as they come from the farmer. Our tobacco crop comes from nearly every State and territory in the Union.

DEATH IN THE RITES

ELKS' INITIATION CEREMONY RESULTS FATALLY.

Story that E. W. Curry, of Iowa, Was Unintentionally Tortured in a Lodge—Sat on Metallic Chair Under Which a Lamp Was Burning.

Regarded as an Accident.

Edward W. Curry, chairman of the Iowa Democratic State Central Committee, died at his hotel in Des Moines as the result of blood poisoning, following injuries received during the progress of his initiation into the United Brotherhood of Elks lodge. Mr. Curry had been sick for several weeks. The story of his injuries was well guarded, both by Mr. Curry and members of the lodge. During his sickness he expressed the opinion that the members of the lodge were in no way to blame for the accident and the desire that nothing should be made public.

E. W. CURRY.

More or less of the truth, however, became known. Immediately following his death conflicting stories as to the nature of the initiatory rites to which he had been subjected were told. One of these stories were which printed in an afternoon paper was to the effect that Mr. Curry was seated on a chair connected with an electrical current. That as he did not move with a small current, more was turned on, and that ultimately, without his moving, the current was increased until it was found that blue smoke was arising from his flesh; that then he was pulled from his chair severely burned and taken to his room, death finally resulting. This story was strenuously denied by members of the lodge, who claim there are no electrical appliances in the lodge-room.

In view of the conflicting stories, several members of the lodge consented to talk. Their stories agree and probably give a correct version of the episode. It is as follows:

In the course of initiation Mr. Curry, being properly robed in a somewhat light costume and blindfolded, was placed upon a chair having a metallic bottom. Under this chair an ordinary kerosene lamp was placed. It was expected that when sufficient heat had developed he would jump from the chair in alarm and furnish merriment to the assembled Elks.

Mr. Curry, being of a stoical disposition and perhaps unduly excited by the ordeal through which he had passed, had evidently made up his mind to take whatever punishment was meted out to him. In the course of events and retained his seat until his garments took fire and he was severely burned. His constitution had not been strong, and as a result of the ordeal he took to his bed. At first it was expected he would soon recover, but the wounds did not heal and blood poisoning set in, which could not be controlled by the physicians, and death was the result. During his sickness, which was of several weeks' duration, Mr. Curry stated to a member of the lodge that he had no idea he was being severely burned. He thought at the time, he said, that a fly blister or something of the same nature had been attached to him, and thought he could stand it as well as those who had taken the degree before.

HIS APPAREL WEIGHED 100 LBS.

How a Yonkers Burglar Shrank When He Was Compelled to Disrobe.

The police of New York captured 250 pounds of burglar, which netted them 150 pounds of prisoner. The extra hundred was stolen feminine attire and miscellaneous dry goods, in which the thief had so swathed his person that he could not escape when pursued. At the station the sergeant ordered the man to take off his coat and vest. Layer after layer of clothing was removed, and when it was all done there stood before them a person weighing about 150 pounds. These are some of the things in which he was clothed:

Three pairs of corsets.
Two corset waists.
A woman's night robe.
A balloon sleeve pink waist.
A black merino skirt.
Two white vests.
A red plush wrapper.
One pair of black stockings.
One breakfast gown.

The bottom parts of the gowns were stuffed into his trousers, which gave him the appearance of great corpulency. Stuffed in his bosom were a feather fan

There were clothing, shoes, hats, caps, pipes, pocketbooks, jewelry, silverware, two watches and a small handbag containing money.

What is believed by the police to be a dynamite bomb was found on the tracks in the Grand Central Depot at New York. It is made of iron about a foot long and four inches in diameter. Inside is some powder and a lot of peculiar dark, dirt-like substance which the police say is dynamite.

CHAPTER IX—(Continued.)

He was dimly conscious of sitting down and hearing a long explanation about trains and disinclination to leave home, and regrets, and cabs, but nothing of it conveyed a clear idea to his mind. He gathered vaguely that this girl, who was one of the Graces of Gracedieu in Wisconsin, had arrived that morning without ticket or money, and the dwarf happened providentially to be in the same train and paid the fare for her.

What he heard left little or no impression upon him except when she spoke. All his attention was fixed in wondering regard upon her face and form. It was not until Leigh and he were in the street once more that he recovered from the shock and surprise.

"That is the most marvelous thing I ever saw in all my life," said he, as the two walked away.

"Yes," said Leigh, "the most marvelous."

"I can scarcely believe it even yet," said Hanbury in a tone of reverie.

"When you fainted in Chetwynd street and I went to offer help, I took off my hat to your young lady and said, 'Miss Grace, can I be of any use?' or words to that effect."

"I do not wonder."

"Hah! You could not tell one from the other. I could not when I first saw your young lady. Now I could."

"Indeed?" said Hanbury, with frigid politeness. At first this wretched creature had been all silky fur and purring sounds; now he seemed all claws and hisses.

"Yes. Miss Ashton has more go, more vitality, more vigor, more nerve, more enterprise, more enthusiasm, more divinity."

Hanbury turned round and gazed at the hunchback with astonishment. There was the hurry of eloquence in his words, and the flash of enthusiasm in his eyes. This man was not an ordinary man, physically or intellectuality. Hanbury instantly altered his mental attitude towards the dwarf. He no longer assumed the pose of a superior, the method of a master. He recognized an equal.

"I may rely on your keeping this whole affair quiet?" he said.

"But you have not heard my request. I told you I could show you something more wonderful than mystery gold. I told you I could show you a more wonderful thing than even miracle gold. I have shown that to you. Now I want my hush money."

"What is it?"

"An introduction to Miss Ashton."

"An introduction to Miss Ashton?"

"Yes."

"When do you wish to meet Miss Ashton?"

"Now. There never was any time past or future as good as the present."

"Come with me."

Hanbury turned west and led the way. For a time the two men walked along in silence.

"This is Mrs. Ashton's house."

Leigh aroused out of the abstraction and looked up. Miss Ashton was at the open window of the drawing room.

The dwarf drew back a pace from the house and swept the ground with his hat.

"Did I not tell you I would show you something more wonderful than mystery gold?" he asked of Hanbury.

"Yes."

"Did I keep my word?"

"The likeness is most astonishing. Come in."

"If the likeness is not complete it may go hard with the miracle gold."

CHAPTER X.

Mrs. Ashton's drawing room would, under ordinary circumstances, be open to any friend or acquaintance brought there by Hanbury. He was a well-received frequenter of the house, and though the relations between him and Miss Ashton had not been announced, they were understood in the household.

Before knocking at the door Hanbury turned to Leigh and said: "By the way, there are likely to be a good number of people here at this hour on Thursday."

"I know. An At Home."

"Precisely. You will not, of course, say a word about what occurred earlier. I mean in that blind street."

When they got into the drawing room, Dora smiled and bent graciously to Leigh. He bowed, but not nearly so low as when Hanbury introduced him to her mother. There was no exaggeration in his bow this time. He raised his head more quickly, more firmly, and then threw it up and held it back, looking around him with hard, haughty eyes. To Hanbury's astonishment Leigh appeared quite at his ease. He was neither confused nor insolent.

As Hanbury saw Dora approach and meet Leigh, he was more struck than before with the extraordinary likeness between her and Edith Grace.

Was she still angry with him? She showed him no sign of resentment or forgiveness. She gave her eyes and attention to this man whom he had been forced to bring with him.

"Yes," Leigh was saying to Mrs. Ashton, "I am a servant of time. I am now engaged in making a clock which will, I think, be the most remarkable in the world."

"Have you been to Strasburg?" asked Hanbury.

"Bah! Strasburg, no! Why should I go to Strasburg? To see other clocks is only to see how effects have been produced. With a conjuror the great difficulty is not to discover how to perform any trick, but to discover a trick that will be worth performing. I am not going in for any nonsense about perpetual motion. There will be thousands of figures in my clock, thousands of automaton Figures of Time to move in one endless procession. These figures will differ from all others to be found in horologes. They will be designed wholly to please and educate the eye by their artistic virtues and graces. The mechanical movements will be wholly subject to naturalness and beauty. I have been in great difficulty to find a worthy model for my Pallas-Athena. Until to-day I was in despair."

There appeared nothing unpleasantly marked or emphatic in Leigh's manner; but Hanbury knew he meant the model for the donor of the olive had been found in Dora. Good heavens! this creature had dared to select as his model for a figure in this raree-show of charlatan mechanism this girl to whom he, John Hanbury, was engaged!

Mrs. Ashton understood the implication in the speech by an almost imperceptible reverence of the poor blighted, deformed body to her beautiful, shapely, well-born daughter. A look of amusement and tenderness came into her thin, mobile, sympathetic face. "And you have been so fortunate as to find a model for your goddess?"

"Yes, and no. I did not find so much a model for my goddess as a goddess who had strayed down from the heights of Greek myth."

"This must be a lucky day with you, Mr. Leigh," Mrs. Ashton said pleasantly. "And when did you meet your divinity?"

"In the afternoon. I saw her in the afternoon." He looked angrily at Hanbury. The latter thought, "He is under obligation not to say anything of the Chetwynd street event; he, the traitorous wretch, will content himself with referring to it, so that Dora and I may know what he means. The false sneak!" He felt his face burn and blaze.

Dora turned pale. She knew nothing of what had passed between the two men since she saw them last, and felt faint when she thought of John Hanbury's rage if the little man referred to their earlier meeting.

"Mr. Hanbury was with me at the time," said Leigh.

Hanbury fixed his eyes on the mechanist with threatening deliberateness. Dora grew cold and paler and faint. She felt there was certain to be a scene, a most unpleasant scene. Mrs. Ashton saw nothing, understood nothing.

"Where did you meet this Pallas-Athena?" she asked.

"In Grimsby street," answered Leigh with a bow to Miss Ashton, and a look of malignant triumph at Hanbury.

The latter started and looked round him with as much surprise as if he suddenly found himself unexpectedly in a strange place. This man was too subtle and lithe for him. Who could have expected this wriggle? Dora glanced up with an expression of relief. The color came back quickly to her face, and the aspect of alarmed expectancy vanished.

Mrs. Ashton turned from one to another, with quick, inquiring, puzzled eyes. She saw now there was something unusual beneath the surface of all this. "What is the mystery? You will tell me, Mr. Leigh?"

"No mystery at all," answered Leigh, in a quick, light, off-hand way. "I happened to come across Mr. Hanbury accidentally, and we met the lady of whom I speak."

"Oh, then she is a lady. She is not a professional model."

"Hah! No. She is not a professional model.

"I wonder do I know her. May I hear her name?"

"Mr. Hanbury will, I have no doubt, tell you," said Leigh, moving off with a smile. "He was introduced to her at the meeting. I was not. He was as much struck by the likeness as I."

"The likeness! The likeness to Pallas-Athena?" said Mrs. Ashton in perplexity.

"Yes," said the dwarf with another smile, as he made room for two men who were coming up the room to Mrs. Ashton.

CHAPTER XI.

The air of pleasant badinage which pervaded the room had no more effect on Oscar Leigh than on the gasalier. No one spoke to him, for no one knew him. Except what passed between Leigh and Hanbury all words were intended for any ears who might hear. After strolling through the rooms with Hanbury for some time, Leigh approached the table where Dora was dispensing tea.

When Leigh finished eating the bread and butter and drinking the tiny cup of tea, he said: "You wish, Miss Ashton, to know in what way I have been lucky today?"

She looked in perplexity at Hanbury, and then at the dwarf. She had no doubt he had alluded to her when he spoke of having found a model for the Pallas-Athena.

She said pleasantly: "One always likes to hear of good fortune coming to those in whom one is interested."

"I was speaking a moment ago about the figures of time in my clock. I had the honor of telling Mrs. Ashton that there would be thousands of them, and that they would be modeled, not chiefly or at all for the display of mechanism, but, in the first place, as works of art; to these works of art mechanism would be adapted later."

"Which will make your clock the only one of the kind in the world," said she, much relieved to find no pointed reference to herself.

"Precisely. But I did not do myself the honor of telling Mrs. Ashton of what material the figures were to be composed."

"No. I do not think you said what they would be made of. Wax, is it not?"

"The models will, of course, be made of wax, but the figures themselves, the figures which I intend to bequeath to posterity, will be made of gold."

"Gold! All those figures made of gold! Why, your clock will cost a fortune."

"It will not cost me as much as it would cost any other man living. I am going to make the gold, too." He drew himself up and looked proudly round. "I have invented a metal, a compound which is absolutely indistinguishable from gold, which is, in fact, gold, and of which I shall make my figures. Mystery gold was a clumsy juggle that one found out in the fire. My gold is bona fide a miracle, and I have called it Miracle Gold. My gold will resist the acid, and the blowpipe, and the crucible."

"And does the good fortune you speak of concern the manufacture of this miracle gold?" she asked with a faint flush, and eyes shining with anxiety.

"It does."

"A discovery which perhaps will make the manufacture less dangerous?"

"Which would make the manufacture unnecessary."

She clasped her hands before her with delight, and cried while her eyes shone joyously into his, "Oh, that would be lucky indeed. And how will you know if your augury of good fortune will come true?"

"You are interested? He bent his head still lower, and his voice was neither so firm nor so harsh. "Would you care to hear as soon as I know?"

"Oh, yes."

"I shall, I think, be certain by this day week."

"Then come to us again next Thursday. We shall all be here as we are now."

He backed a pace and bowed to her, and then turned round, and, with head erect and scornful eyes flashing right and left, but seeing nothing, strode out of the room.

"Dora," whispered her mother, "you have made another conquest. That little genius is in love with you."

The girl laughed, but did not look up for a moment. When she did so her eyes were full of tears.

(To be continued.)

JUNGLES OF GUIANA.

Mass of Vegetation that Can Scarcely Be Penetrated.

The vegetation of the Guianas is a devouring mass of green, which steadily encroaches, and is kept down only by the ceaseless warfare of one plant upon another. A tree springs up and finds its way to the top by its energy. It is no sooner established than a parasite begins to climb its trunk and lace itself around the tree, until finally the grip of the parasite kills the tree, and both fall to ruin and decay, leaving a space which is immediately occupied by new forms.

To penetrate such a jungle is impossible without the use of a machete and ax. To keep a path open requires constant cutting. If you shoot a bird or an animal, it falls perhaps not more than three hundred feet away; but it may require a half-hour or an hour to reach it, and unless you can shoot from a canoe, and can drop the bird into the water, as a rule you cannot find your game after it is killed. Words cannot describe the beauty of this mass of green, vigorous vegetation, nor can one comprehend the difficulty of conquering such a wilderness unless one has actually grappled with it.—Century.

The Contract Had Expired.

Rufus Lockwood was a genius in his way and was probably one of the best lawyers in the State. Lockwood went at one time to Horace Hawes, a very distinguished lawyer and the author of the consolidation act which is now in force. Hawes had a reputation for close figuring and Lockwood knew it. He said: "Mr. Hawes, I'll hire myself to you for one year from date at a salary of $25 a day, payable every night."

"All right," said Hawes, delighted to engage the services of the brightest mind in the State at so low a figure—for the salary was not a great one in those days—and the bargain was sealed. It was 11 o'clock in the morning. But from that time on, it is said, Hawes never missed an opportunity of reminding Lockwood of his bondage. He would say in the presence of others: "Lockwood, go and fetch that book;" "Lockwood, go and fetch this or that," etc. Lockwood never said a word, but did as he was bidden, and Hawes enjoyed his triumph.

Finally it came to the day when the year's engagement terminated. There was a most important lawsuit on hand, which Lockwood had made a careful study of; no one in the State could possibly have handled it as he did. Well, on the day in question Lockwood stood in court, an array of court books in front of him, and expounded his views in masterly fashion. Suddenly he looked up at the clock and saw that it was the hour of 11. Closing the book from which he was quoting, he turned to Hawes, who was sitting beside him, and said: "Mr. Hawes, a year ago today at this hour I contracted to work for you one year. My time's up, the contract is canceled and I am going."

Thus did he repay his master for the humiliation heaped upon him. Hawes was in the greatest consternation; he could not possibly take up the thread of the case where Lockwood had left it and he begged and implored him to proceed. But Lockwood remembered, and he turned a deaf ear to all persuasions. He kept his word; the contract had expired.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Grafting of Plants.

All gardeners know that curious plants can be produced by grafting, and to the country it is no extraordinary sight to see a tree bearing two kinds of plum or pear as the result of it. Mr. A. W. Sutton of the great seed establishment at Reading has lately described in the Journal of the Royal Horticultural Society a number of interesting experiments made with tomato and potato plants, these two being botanically related to one another. A potato tuber was planted, and when it had attained the height of a few inches above the soil, the stem was cut off and a tomato graft was combined to it. As a result, the composite plant produced a crop of potatoes at the roots, while the foliage above ground bore a crop of tomatoes, nourished by the potato roots. The process was then reversed, a potato graft being introduced upon tomato stalks. The tomato roots did not produce potatoes, but the potato plant above ground first threw out potato flowers and berries, and afterward produced tubers from the axils of the leaves and stems. In this case the designation of the potato as a pomme de terre is evidently a misnomer.—Leisure Hours.

Components of a Complication.

A woman carrying a jug of gasoline was run down by a man riding a bicycle last night at Forest and Orleans streets. When the woman fell the gasoline was upset. The man's cigarette fell into the woman's gasoline, igniting the fluid and making a lively blaze for a while. Neither the man nor the woman was much hurt, and they hastily got away before their names could be obtained by the patrolman who shortly arrived on the scene.—Baltimore Sun.

The skeleton of a man has been found in the hollow of an old tree near the battlefield of Seven Pines in Virginia. The aperture in which this gruesome discovery was made is now too small to have admitted the body. A belt fastening found by the side of the skeleton bears the name of the Sixty-ninth New York Regiment, to which the man is supposed to have belonged.

Some of the Belgian coal mines are wonderfully deep. In a pit at Flenu coal is now being "got" 3,700 feet below the surface. At another pit, at Montigny-sur-Sambre, a coal seam is worked 3,000 feet deep.

WOMAN'S NOTE

ADVICE TO GIRLS.

FEW wiser counselors of young girls can be found than Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, who has in her day planned much work, duty and pleasure for the younger members of her sex. In a recent article discussing the serious side of the girl's life this noted writer gives her views in brisk, hopeful language as follows:

"Girls, first make up your mind that you will be something. All the rest will follow. What you shall be comes more easily and clearly in due time. A girl of 13 cannot decide with any discretion or any assurance whether she will be a sculptor or a washerwoman, a farmer or a poet; but she can decide distinctly whether it is her wish or duty, after leaving school or college, to remain dependent upon her parents or fit herself for a self-providing life. The education by which you mean to get your bread and butter, your gloves and bonnets, is a very different affair from that which you take upon yourself as an ornament and an interval in life. The chemical experiment which you may some day have to explain to pupils of your own is quite another thing from the lesson that you may never think of again. The practice in bookkeeping, which may sometimes regulate your dealings with live flesh and blood customers, becomes as interesting as a new story. The dull old rules for inflection and enunciation fairly turn into poetry if you hope to find yourself a great public reader some coming day. And the very sawdust of the French or the Latin grammar becomes ashes of roses to the stout little fancy that dreams of brave work and big salary in some foreign department at Washington or tutoring girls or boys for college.

"All over the terrible ocean, among the lawless sailors, the men with wives and children to work for are those who lead the gentlest and cleanest lives. So, on the great ocean of school life, the girls with aims to study for are those whose labor is the richest and ripest. Ah, you will never realize till you have tried it what an immense power over the life is the power of possessing distinct aims. The voice, the dress, the look, the very motion of a person define and alter when he or she begins to live for a reason. I fancy that I can select in a crowded city the busy, blessed women who support themselves. They carry themselves with an air of conscious self-respect and self-content which a shabby alpaca cannot hide, nor a rich silk enhance, nor even sickness or exhaustion quite drag out."

Order Reigns in This Trunk.

The process of improving trunks has been steadily pursued since the days of the huge round-topped Saratoga. The modern trunk is a triumph of ingenuity, and perfection seems almost to have been reached. What more can really be desired than a trunk that will open without being pulled out from the wall, against which porters invariably jam it, and of which the bottom and every other part is as accessible as the top?

AN IDEAL TRUNK.

One of the latest inventions is really a movable chest of drawers, from any one of which articles can be removed without disturbing the entire contents of the trunk. Things of a fragile nature, too, are not endangered by the weight of goods above them.

Why Men Fail as Lovers.

"It is a question with me," says a writer in the Ladies' Home Journal, "whether a woman ever knows all the joys of lovemaking who has one of those dumb, silent husbands who doubtless adores her, but is able to express it only in deeds. It requires an act of will to remember that his getting downtown at 7 o'clock every morning is all done for you, when he hasn't been able to tell you in words that he loves you. It is hard to get a letter telling about the weather and how busy he is, when the same amount of space saying that he got to thinking about you yesterday when he saw a girl on the street who looked like you, only she didn't carry herself as well as you do, and that he loves you, good-by—would have fairly made your heart turn over with joy and made you kiss the hurried lines and thrust the letter in your belt, where you could crackle it now and then just to make sure it was there. Nearly all nice men make good lovers in deeds. A great many fail at some important crisis in the handling of words."

The Way a Woman Stands.

"Without knowing how to stand and to hold the body well," said an authority on physical culture, "no woman can sit, stand or walk with grace, or with any amount of lacing and padding be anything but ungraceful. Just cast your eye along the line of your acquaintances of the gentler sex when they are unconscious of your scrutiny and see how much they could improve their looks by a little care and attention to the proper position when standing. Stand firmly but lightly, with the weight resting on the ball of the foot, poised so that one can rise on the toes without bending backward or forward to keep the balance. Practice this. Do not jerk your elbows; do not lean backwards from the waist; rest the head and chest and draw in the chin. This position puts the shoulders where they belong, curves the back naturally, flattens the abdomen and raises the bust. This position can be acquired by patience and perseverance, and many defects may be eliminated by remembering to assume this attitude whenever standing, and soon it will become second nature. Above all, do not give undue prominence to the abdomen; nothing is so ugly, and certainly even the best cut skirt will not hang well on a person in this posture."

Bogus Sealskin Garments.

The plush imitation sealskin sacks so popular some years ago have gone out of vogue entirely. Yet in obedience to the demands for a substitute which will deceive the unpracticed eye manufacturers are introducing garments made of rabbits' skins so cleverly dressed to imitate the coverings of the seal that detection will be possible only to the expert. It is expected that this innovation will be one of the most remarkable developments the fur trade has ever known. The new fur is called "electric seal," and consists of the skin of the ordinary French tame rabbit electrically treated. The idea is not new. It has been considered for many years, but it is only through recent modifications and improvements in mechanism rendered possible by electricity that it has become a factor to be seriously reckoned with in the wholesale fur business.

Invented by Women.

A scissors holder consisting of a metal loop, with ends bent backward and safety-pin attachment.

An ingenious work table provided with handy little pockets and drawers which pull out just where wanted.

A combination of curling tongs and stove or heater for same, with fuel, and all combined in a pocket case.

An ingenious hinged garment stretcher, which simulates the human form and when not in use folds into a small compass.

A sectional blackboard for school purposes, with sections so arranged as to permit several scholars to work at once without interference.

A lapboard which, instead of being made in the ordinary shape is made round, and prevents any possible looseness in the outside material, as the board has practically the curve of the body.

American Girls Criticised.

"American girls," said an observant Frenchman, "may easily be detected abroad by their energy and lack of repose. They seem to be always afraid of missing something. When they come over here they want to look under the gravestones; the exterior of things is not enough for them; they want interiors, and they adore underground passages; they do not even abhor the steps that lead to them. From the time they leave their native shores they never sit back. When they are driving they sit forward on the edge of the seats; they seem to think that in this way they are propelling the horses and that they will reach their destination quicker."

Lining a Skirt Properly.

All the new gowns are made with silk linings, but the outer part is not joined to the under, except just at the waistband and for three inches down on each seam. One or two gowns lately finished have the outer part and the lining caught together where the facing is put on; but this is a dangerous experiment for any but a very smart seamstress to undertake. The underskirt must be faced up quite a distance with stiff interlining, and must have a steel across the front breadth, slipped into the hem. The outer skirt should also be stiffened with canvas or crinoline, but not made too stiff.

New York's Rainy Day Club.

The Rainy Day Club of New York is an established fact. One hundred women have already gone into the crusade against long skirts for wet weather. Letters have poured into the club from all over the country. The women who have interested themselves in this reform are prominent. They announce that the costume which has been adopted has nothing about it that suggests the bloomer girl or would shock the sensibilities of the most modest of the fair sex. "In point of fact," says the secretary, "it is infinitely more modest than the uplifted skirt, dripping with rain."

Notes of the Mode.

A pretty front for a red cloth bodice is made of ecru lace insertion, held together by black velvet ribbon.

Alpaca petticoats with ruffles of the same bound with satin of a contrasting color are very pretty and much more durable than silk.

Red is the favorite color for many little accessories of dress, and a brown coat and skirt costume is made very attractive by a red silk vest.

Blouse waists of flannelette and silk are still very much worn, but the color of the skirt must be repeated in the bodice if you would be quite up to date.

The tendency in dress just now is to fit the waists very snug and close, as if they were molded to the figure. The Greek sculptor's idea of a short waist and long limbs seems to be reversed in the methods of the modern tailor.

The new combination undergarments are very attractive with an extra belt of pink merino, which extends from the bust well below the waist. This gives warmth where it is needed, and the pink and white mixture is very pretty.

Boleros of finely tucked silk in any color you choose are one of the features of dress, and black velvet boleros, covered with an applique of white satin leaves outlined with cord and steel, are made to wear with different bodices.

Jeweled buttons and enameled buttons, so carefully done that they resemble Florentine mosaics, are used on both afternoon and evening dresses. Added to these are some novelties in celluloid, imitating old gold and silver in rococo designs.

RICHARD PARKS BLAND.

Defeated for the Presidential Nomination, He Goes Back to Congress.

Richard Parks Bland, of Missouri, is perhaps congratulating himself now that the eloquent Nebraskan snatched the Democratic nomination for President from him at Chicago. It will be remembered that up to the time Bryan made his memorable convention speech, Bland appeared to have the nomination already in hand. Bryan's eloquence turned the tide the other way. An effort to make Bland the vice-presidential nominee also failed. A few weeks later his friends at home nominated him for Congress and he was elected.

After an absence of two years Bland therefore returns to the capital, where for twenty years he was the most conspicuous advocate of free silver. He is the author of many free silver bills, notably that which was merged in the Bland-Allison act of 1878. The silver bill of 1890, which passed the House and led to the Sherman compromise, also bore Bland's name. He has been rightly called "the father of free coinage."

Bland was born on a Kentucky farm in 1835. His father died when he was 7, his mother a few years later, but the boy, dependent on his own resources, worked his way through school. He managed to get an academic training and then taught school in Kentucky and Missouri. In 1855 he went to California and spent ten years teaching school, studying law, practicing law and fighting Indians. In 1865 he returned to Missouri and in 1868 settled on a farm at Lebanon, his present home. In 1872 he was elected to Congress and served continuously until the close of the Fifty-third Congress, when, having been defeated in the landslide of 1894, he retired to his farm.

NO MORE COLD FEET.

Inventive Genius Now Gives Us Heated Shoes for Winter.

Paul Wonneberger, a resident of Dresden, the capital of Saxony, has devised a heatable shoe, which will cause his name to be blessed wherever mortals suffer from cold feet during the winter season. The apparatus consists of a tiny boiler and furnace in the heel and sole of the shoe, which causes a continuous circulation of warm water around the extremities. Within the heel of the heatable shoe, which is hollowed out for the purpose, the inventor has placed a glowing substance similar in its nature to that used in the familiar Japanese hand warmers. The soles of the shoes are hollowed out for the reception of a rubber bag covered with asbestos, and containing the water that keeps the feet warm. This water communicates with the receptacle in the heel of the shoe, and derives its heat from the heated substance located there.

Whn the owner of a pair of heatable shoes wishes to go out into the cold and sloppy street he opens the receptacle in the heel of the shoe, lights the punk like substance, closes the perforated band that holds it in place and then sallies forth to bid defiance to his old enemy, the chills. Walking keeps the water circulating, and at every step the grateful warmth is felt, the upper as well as the lower surface of the feet feeling its effects. The shoes are a trifle heavier than the ordinary ones. The sole is but very little thicker than that of the ordinary wet weather shoe.

Haste Wastes Time.

A gentleman who had an impediment in his speech was dining in a restaurant, and was being served—a great favor—by the proprietor of the establishment. This man was a bustling, nervous person, with an exaggerated opinion of the value of his time.

Soup was served. The guest waited a moment, and at the first opportunity, began to say to the restaurant-keeper:

"I c-c-c-an't e-e-e-ea——"

"Well, what is it, sir?" asked the restaurant-keeper, impatiently.

"I c-c-an't eat my soup——"

The man snatched up the plate of soup and was off after another, which in due time he brought; but again the guest began to murmur:

"I c-c-c-an't eat my soup——"

"Well, pray," asked the restaurant-keeper, "what may be the matter with this soup, that you are unable to eat it?"

"I c-c-c-can't ea-en-eat my soup, I t-t-tell you," answered the guest, "w-w-withou-ou-out a sp-p-p-poon to eat it with!"

Then the restaurant-keeper comprehended that he would have saved time and temper if he had waited for his stammering guest to finish his sentence.

Useful Baboon.

Certain wild animals can be trained to act very intelligently as servants of man, and even to exceed the dog in power of thought and action. Le Vaillant, the African traveller, says that he had a tame baboon which was not only sentinel, but hunter and purveyor of food and water. This monkey, by sheer force of brains, took command of the dogs which protected the camp, and used and directed them just as the older baboons command and direct the rest of the tribe.

By his cries, says Le Vaillant, he always warned us of the approach of an enemy before even the dogs discovered it. They were so accustomed to his voice that they used to go to sleep, and at first I was vexed with them for deserting their duties; but when he had once given the alarm, they would all stop to watch for his signal, and on the least motion of his eye, or the shaking of his head, I have seen them rush toward the quarter where his looks were directed.

I often carried him on my hunting expeditions, during which he would amuse himself by climbing trees, in order to aid us in the pursuit of game.

When he was thirsty he used to hunt about and discover some succulent tuber which was as effectual, under the circumstances, as watermelon. One might say that he was not more clever than a truffle-dog; but though the dog can find a root he cannot dig it up.

The baboon did both, having the advantage of hands; though he used these, not to extract the root, but to adjust his weight so as to use the leverage of his teeth to the best advantage.

He laid hold of the tuft of leaves with his teeth, pressed his four paws on the earth, on all sides of it, and then drew his head slowly back. The root generally followed.

If this plan did not succeed, he seized the root as low down as he could, and then throwing his heels over his head, turned a back somersault and came up smiling with the root in his mouth. It was easy to teach him that it was a part of his business to find these roots and that his master must "go shares."

FINEST CYCLING CLUB.

Home of the Largest Organization of Wheelmen in the World.

When the new home of the Illinois Cycling Club, 1215 Washington boulevard, Chicago, was dedicated recently, what is conceded to be the finest cycling clubhouse in the world was opened. The event marked the consummation of indefatigable energy on the part of the directors to provide a home for their fellow members which should be second to none in this or any other country. That their endeavors were successful is shown by the palatial edifice now occupied by the club. All of which is pleasing to the Illinois men. It is quite appropriate as well, as the club is the largest cycling organization in the world. That it should occupy the largest edifice of its kind is most fit. The house cost nearly $40,000. The furnishings were installed at an additional expense of $9,000, and the ground upon which the house stands is valued at $12,000.

FIREMEN ON WHEELS.

Inventor Arranges a Novel Machine for Use in Fire Departments.

An inventor of Racine has secured a patent for a new bicycle fire engine which will be of value at places where there are good roads. The machine itself is very simple, yet it is a complete chemical engine. It is a three-wheeled affair, but otherwise is built much on the plan of the modern bicycle. The seat and handle bars are arranged as on an ordinary bicycle. Between the two forward wheels, resting on the axle, is a thirty-two gallon aluminum tank, in which is the chemically prepared water for use at the fire. The tank is galvanized and made rust proof, and is covered with a heavy brass jacket. The machine is fitted with pneumatic tires and the frame is made of heavy bicycling tubing. At the top of the tank there is a pressure gauge. Fifty feet of hose is carried, the hose being wound around the tank. When ready for use the engine machine, without the rider, weighs 225 pounds. Several tandem bicycle engines are now being built on the same lines. Each machine is equipped with lanterns, fire axes, crow bars and pikepoles.

An Apt Comparison.

The following is an interesting comparison: "Suppose that a farmer raises 1,000 bushels of wheat in a year, and also sells this to 1,000 persons in all parts of the country, a great portion of them saying, 'I will hand you a dollar in a short time.' The farmer does not want to be small and says 'all right.' Soon the 1,000 bushels are gone and he has nothing to show for it, and he then realizes that he has fooled away his whole crop, and its value is due in a thousand little driblets. Subsequently he is seriously embarrassed in business because his debtors, each owing him one dollar, treat it as a small matter, and think it would not help much. Continue this business year in and year out, as the publisher of a newspaper does, how long would he stand it?"

"Yes, in some respects my wife is much like that lightning-change artist." "Why?" "Oh, I have known her to change her mind six times in one minute."—Philadelphia North American.

THANKSGIVING!

The day for Everybody to rest, and eat Turkey for Dinner,

To-morrow is the day on which the old thanksgiving custom picks us up and gathers us around some family fireside for the enjoyment of a real family reunion, such as to many of us, can come but once a year. Turkey is usually the main feature of the feast, though lacking that, any fine fowl will fill its place.

THE ROMAN BIRD.

At their feasts, the Roman's considered the peacock a great dainty. An American would go hungry for some time before he would indulge in it. As a dish, it ranks with us, next to "crow."

A familiar scene in many an Auburn home to-mmorrow.

BUTLER.

The old frame woodworking establishment erected by Sam Stoy on the right of the Butler Co. has been removed to give room for a large storage room to be erected by the Co. They have added about forty hands to their force.

The writer recently visited and saw quite a large number of empty houses and not withstanding this discouraging feature of the place, nearly a dozen new structures were being constructed.

The Ashley and Chili division scheme is again revived and some think this connecting link will be built.

Albert Planson, youngest son of Mr. Lewis Planson died rather suddenly last week of acute congestion of the lungs. He was a promising young man just past his 21st year and loved and respected by all who knew him. The fortunes of this family seem to be somewhat peculiar. The father, for some unknown reason suddenly left his family aboul twenty years ago and has since been a prospector and miner in the regions of the Coloradoes, has upon a single occasion paid a visit to his family, then remaining but a few days when he again returned to the mines. Whether living at the present time or not the writer is unable to say. The funeral took place from the M. E. church, Rev. Disbro officsating. He leaves his aged mother, one brother and one sister to mourn over his early departure.

The diphtheria scare has about subsided but many fear for its possible further visitation.

J. A. Campbell and A. J. Dillon of Rochester, Ind. adjusted the Kennedy loss near Spencerville last Friday.

Corn in this vicinity is about all husked and farmers are nearer being ready for winter than usually at this time of the year.

Marry This Girl Quick.

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad oder and saves oil, it is easy to sell. If you wish to try it send 13 cent stamps to Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A. St. Louis, Mo., and she will send you sample outfit, this is a good way to make money around home.

WATERLOO.

Phil Morell has been having a large square window and transom put in one of his parlors on Maple street. It is a great improvement.

Rev. Klutz and Mr. P. Morell have greatly improved their premises by cutting out some trees, and having others well trimmed.

During the past week a gentleman and his wife have been in Waterloo with quite a stock of books, which they sold at private sale during the day and auction in the evening.

Rev. and Mrs. Klutz and Mrs. Dell Locke of Decatur leave Waterloo Thanksgiving morning for Chicago, taking train there for Salt Lake City which they will reach Saturday evening where they remain until Monday and then go direct to Los Angeles where they will remain some time. They will visit other towns in that section.

It is said that Saturday a cave or dig out was discovered in the north part of town in a grove of willows, where it is not easy to find. It has a wooden door fitted and stove or conveniences for a fire, and chicken feathers were there in abundance. Boys of about twelve years of age perhaps have been seen to go there. Perhaps this explains where part of the stolen chickens have gone. One gentleman alone has lost fifty or more.

Mrs. Fenniman, wife of a minister of the Reformed church is visiting in town a few days with friends, and calling on old acquaintances. The family formerly lived here. Rev. Fenniman being Pastor of that church in Waterloo. They were highly esteemed. Mr. Fenniman is settled in Tiffin, Ohio. Mrs. F. has been west on a visit, and stops here on his return.

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A M Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly, Diphtheria.

Our neighboring town of Columbia City has been compelled to close one of her schools on account of diphtheria Three deaths have occured since Sunday morning and two new cases have developed. They will use every possible effort to keep the disease from spreading. It is absolutely necessary to enforce rigid measures to check the spread of the disease. Every precaution should be used in Auburn to prevent this disease from fastening its clutches on any of our people.

HOW TO PREVENT CROUP.

SOME READING THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO YOUNG MOTHERS. HOW TO GUARD AGAINST THE DISEASE

Croup is a terror to young mothers and to post them concerning the cause, first symptoms and treatment is the object of this item. The origin of croup is a common cold. Children who are subject to it take cold very easily and croup is almost sure to follow. The first symptom is hoarseness: this is soon followed by a peculiar rough cough, which is easily recognized and will never be forgotten by one who has heard it. The time to act is when the child first becomes hoarse. If Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is freely given all tendency to croup will soon disappear. Even after the croupy cough has developed it will prevent the attack. There is no danger in giving this remedy for it contains nothing injuious. For sale by Davenport the Druggist. 48

A Churn That Churns in One Minute.

I have been in the dairy business all my life and have many times churned for an hour before butter would appear, so when I heard of a churn that would churn in a minute, I concluded to try it Every day for a week I used it, and not only could I churn in a minute, but I got more and better butter than with the common churn. This is very important information to butter makers. The churn works easily and will churn an ordinary churning in less than sixty seconds. I have sold two dozen of these churns in the past month, Every butter maker that has seen me churn in less than a minute bought one. You can obtain all desired information regarding the churn by addressing J. F. Casey & Co., St Louis Mo., and they will give you prompt and courteous attention,

A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. —It is said there is a tribe in Central Africa that holds debating societies like white folks. But they run things in a different way. Each speaker as he rises to debate, must stand on one leg, and keep that position till he stops. So the time in each case is limited. Here is a broad hint to some of the orators of the late campaign.

The wife of Mr. Leonard Wells, of East Brimfield, Mass., had been suffering from neuralgia for two days, not being able to sleep or hardly keep still, when Mr. Holden, the merchant there sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Pain Balm, and asked that she give it a thorough trial. —With the doors of our schoo houses thrown wide open, with the buildings warmed and ventilated and furnished with comfort and convenience, with teaching free and with education offered without price, there are yet parents so criminally negligent of their children that they suffer them to grow up in ignorance and obtain their education only amid the vices of the street.—Ex.

—The campaign of education is still open, and it ought to be kept open until clearer views as to the true policy of the nation have been inculcated, and those who are now in darkness are made to see the light. But one of the primary doctrines in such a campaign should be that converts cannot be made with a club, even when it is only a verbal one. No man apprehends a proposition any better for being called a fool, a dolt or an anarchist.

—An old gentleman walked into the parlor of his house the other night at the still hour of 11:45 and found the lights out and his daughter and her beau enjoying the sofa in the corner of the room near the window. "Daughter," said the father sternly, "this is scandalous." "Yes, papa," she answered sweetly, "It is candleless because times are hard. Lights cost so much that Charley and I said we would try to get along with the starlight" And papa turned about in speechless amazement and tried to walk out of the room through a panel in the wall paper.

—In a precinct of Michigan City at the recent election, an intelligent voter entered the polling place, was handed the two ballots and retired to the booth In a short time he emerged, stepped up to the polling clerk and handed that official the blotter used in the booth which he had stamped. The voter returned to the booth, stamped the eagle, and came out and handed the ballots to the clerk.

—Discontented young men, who are unhappy because they accumulate money so slowly, ought to read the sentiments of Andrew Carnegie, the well known millionaire, as he is reviewing the poverty and hard toil of his early life. He says: "You know how people are all moaning about poverty as being a great evil, and it seems he accepted that if people only had money and were rich that they would be happy and more useful and get more out of life. There was never a graver mistake. As a rule there is more happiness, more genuine satisfaction and a truer life in the humble cottages of the poor than in the palaces of the rich."

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle and after taking it a short while was entirely well. —Some one has been observing the different ways people have of carrying their money. Butchers, grocers, bakers and saloonists carry money in a crumpled wad. Editors carry theirs in other people's pockets.

General Williams, The COURIER is glad to say, is not only one of the ablest newspaper men in Indiana, but worthy of and deserving of any office within the gift of the party with which he has so long been identified.

—It now turns out that A. C. Halibach who was arrested at Auburn Junction a few days ago is indeed a very bad man. He is wanted by parties in various towns between Chicago and Delphos, Ohio. Later. Halibach was yesterday sentenced to 2 years in the penitentiary, by the Logansport court. Holibach was not arrested at the Junction by Hathway, of Garrett, as noted in the COURIER, but Marshal West arrested him and held him two hours and telephoned fo Garrett for Hathway and Postmaster Thumma to come and identify him.

No matter who you have a present to buy for, you can be suited at their store, And the little folks will especially be delighted, for a peep behind the counters reveals the fact that there is an enormous assortment in store for them. This store during the past has been crowded with buyers of holiday goods and this season will no doubt exceed all former ones, as there are many more and pretty new and up-to-date articles suitable for presents included in their assortment.

Fifty Years Ago.

This is the stamp that the letter bore
Which carried the story far and wide,
Of certain cure for the loathsome sore
That bubbled up from the tainted tide
Of the blood below. And 'twas Ayer's name
And his sarsaparilla, that all now know,
That was just beginning its fight of fame
With its cures of go years ago.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the original sarsaparilla. It has behind it a record for cures unequalled by any blood purifying compound. It is the only sarsaparilla honored by a medal at the World's Fair of 1893. Others imitate the remedy; they can't imitate the record:

In Paris it has been decided that gambling on the part of a wife constitutes sufficient grounds for divorce.

Women constitute two-thirds of all the church members of the United States, but only one-thirteenth of all the criminals.

Among the curiosities in the Richards free library museum at Claremont, N. H., is the anvil on which was manufactured the first scythe in the United States.

The Mississippi negroes are said to have had a very prosperous season in cotton raising. They will have more cash money this winter than before in ten years and are paying up their debts rapidly.

The ancient copper mines of Sinai have just been re-explored. These were worked by the Egyptians, or their slaves, 7,000 years ago, and are believed to have been abandoned about 3,000 years ago.

One successful venture which has come of the Manchester ship canal is the steamship service between the cotton metropolis and London. It is a long way round, but the saving in freight dues is enormous.

One of the features of California life which is not often noticed in print is the large decrease of the Chinese laboring population of the State. San Francisco's Chinatown has fallen off almost one-half during the last three years.

Mathematical calculations show that an iron ship weighs 27 per cent less than a wooden one, and will carry 115 tons of cargo for every 100 tons carried by a wooden ship of the same dimensions, and both loaded to the same draft of water.

Newest of London's periodicals is the Automotor and Horseless Vehicle Journal, a 6-penny monthly paper, which, in its own words, "anticipates the field which will doubtless soon exist for its operations." Its originators are convinced that in the near future the autocar industry must become an important one in England and other countries.

The marriage rate in Scotland is 66.92 in every 10,000 of the population. To every 100 marriages 456 children are born, as against 418 in England. Of a total of 27,604 marriages which took place during the year 1,166 were irregular, having been performed without proclamation of purpose and without reference to the intervention of religious ceremony.

Italy is about to publish at the government expense a photographic reproduction of the manuscript of Justinian's "Pandects," now preserved in the Florence library. The Florence manuscript is the oldest and most correct we have of the great code of Roman law. It is of the sixth or seventh century, at least, and may perhaps have been written as early as Justinian's own time.

Twenty-three colleges in the United States were founded before the beginning of this century. Among the leading ones are: Harvard, 1636; William and Mary, 1693; Yale, 1701; University of Pennsylvania, 1740; Princeton, 1746; Washington and Lee, 1749; Columbia, 1754; Brown, 1764; Rutgers, 1766; Dartmouth, 1769; Hampden-Sidney, 1775; Washington (Md.), 1782, and Dickinson, 1785.

At the "Theater Salon," the first of the single-performance entertainments to open this season in Paris, the show consisted of the recitation of new ballads of low life, with living pictures as illustrations. All the songs were indecently ambiguous, while the pictures were not ambiguous at all, providing the exhibition of woman's underwear now common to the variety stage. The show was presented as a parlor entertainment.

A learned scientist has recently been investigating the effect of food, particularly vegetables, on the human character. He finds that a diet of carrots ameliorates harshness of character and reduces nervous irritability; peas create fatty tissue and encourage joyousness; white turnips have a depressing influence. Cabbage is good for pulmonary complaints, while lettuce acts as a sedative upon the human frame, owing to the opium contained in its milky juice.

At Trieste three experienced divers are just now engaged upon a highly interesting task. In 1811, a terrible explosion took place in the harbor there, the causes of which have never been explained. Much loss of life and property was caused, and the Danae, a French frigate, was sunk. The divers soon ascertained the position of the hull, but all efforts to raise it have been in vain. The vessel contained $600,000 in gold and the valuable jewels of a French princess.

England's royal marine corps is to be increased by 8,000 men, who are to be substituted for the army contingents that form the garrisons of British strongholds out of Europe, such as Halifax, Hong Kong, Bermuda, St. Helena and Aden. The idea seems to have sprung from the recent growth of the French infanterie de marine and colonial army. The result of the change would be to put the military control of these places entirely in the hands of the navy department.

Considerable apprehension has been excited among Bostonians of a certain sort by the persistence of rumors about a plan for confining the city's liquor saloons to a prescribed territory outside of the residential districts. Nobody seems to know just how or why or by whom this scheme is to be carried out, but as Boston has few or no districts in which very considerable numbers of people do not live, those for whom a convenient saloon is regarded as a necessary condition of existence, show an angry irritation that such a project should have advanced far enough even to have become a topic of conversation.

The Biggest Pension.

The biggest annual pension that is paid in any part of the world is $95,000. The Duke of Richmond is the recipient, and he has never moved a finger or a leg to acquire this vast annuity, which is perpetual, passing from son to son, for no other reason than that the first Duke of Portland had a pull with Charles II.

According to the Army and Navy Journal, in 1676 Charles II. granted to the Duke of Portland a pension of £19,000 a year, in perpetuity, in lieu of a duty of 1 shilling a caldron on all coal exported from the Tyne. Up to 1799 the family had received as proceeds of the duty upward of £2,000,000 sterling and in July, 1799, the duty was commuted for an annual payment in perpetuity of £19,000 a year from the Consolidated Fund. As security for its payment consols to the value of £633,333 6s. 9d. were purchased. In the following year £485,434 4s. 7d. worth of these consols were sold, and the proceeds invested in land, and during the present reign the remainder of the consols were sold and the proceeds similarly invested.

Taking the annual payment on account of pensions at the present time Earl Nelson is in receipt of the highest outside the royal annuities, viz., £5,000 per annum, payable in perpetuity to all and every one of the heirs male to whom the title of Earl of Nelson shall descend.

The Duke of Wellington's annual pension of £4,000 is for life, and Lord Rodney's pension of £2,000 is, like that of Earl Nelson, perpetual. The amount of royal annuities, excluding the Queen's grant of £385,000, is £173,000, and, counting the pensions for naval and military services, £27,700; political and civil, £13,086; judicial, £70,705, besides a large number of miscellaneous pensions; the total comes to £316,758 yearly. The largest pension on retiring from office is the £5,000 a year given to retiring Lord Chancellors.

A Strange Power.

It is a curious thing, the power which some human beings have over animals. There is in Lowell a boy, differing in no respect from his companions, who has this power in a marked degree. Every stray dog or cat in the neighborhood knows him and loves to be in his company. A vicious horse which the stablemen can with difficulty handle will stand like a lamb while he harnesses and unharnesses him. The doves fly around him, and in the woods the wild birds apparently regard him as a friend and ally.

The most remarkable exhibition of his power, which has long been known and commented on by his friends, was given the other day. A large and vicious rat was captured in the stable in one of those traps which permit of easy ingress and no egress. The men who were looking at the animal were afraid to go near the trap, the animal showed such terror, but the boy when he beheld the imprisoned creature fearlessly put out his finger and stroked its head, the rat manifesting as much pleasure as would a cat or a dog. Several days have passed since then, and the stablemen are still afraid of their capture, but he has grown so tame and familiar with the boy as to allow him to take him out and put him in the trap, will come at his whistle, and manifests every appearance of joy in his presence. There seems to be no question but what the boy could train that rat to perform almost any feat within the power of such an animal.—Lowell Evening Star.

Feline Women.

Why is it that "feline" for want of a better word—seems to be an almost wholly feminine attribute? Rarely, if ever, do you come across a man with that small, sly, stealthy streak in his nature that we recognize as "catty." It isn't innate to man, and he hasn't time to cultivate it. Yet among women it is unusual not to find some traces of it, even in the largest, kindliest natures. It is chiefly engendered by sewing societies and the like; in other words, narrow lives. Although "small" in one sense, and although, of course, by no means ranking with the seven deadly sins, this feline quality manages to play some pretty desperate havoc in the world. It makes mischief wherever it goes. Gossip, busybodyishness, malice, uncharitableness, slander, and many other peace-destroying things must follow directly in its wake. Every one who has taken the trouble to reflect upon the "sisters three and such branches of learning" must acknowledge that it is the little things of life that really count for the most; it is they that have a way of turning the tide of events, the most insignificant word or act sometimes shaping destiny itself. But there is no small thing responsible for larger, more impressive results than this same feline quality. And as an altogether feminine prerogative it is one that women need not be proud of.—New York Evening Sun.

A Trembling Pillar.

The Church of St. Nicaise, in the city of Rheims, is surrounded with pillars, one of which sways perceptibly with the ringing of one of the bells of the tower. When the bell is rung it causes the top of this pillar to sway to the extent of seven inches on each side, although the base of the pillar is immovable and the stones are so firmly cemented as to seem like a solid piece of masonry. Although each of the four bells in the tower is about the same distance from the trembling pillar, only one of them has any effect on it, the ringing of the others either singly or all together not causing it to tremble in the least. When a board was placed on the pillar, bearing two glasses of water, and the bell was rung, at the fifth stroke of the bell the two glasses were thrown off. Curiously enough, it was an adjoining pillar that formerly swayed, then it became immovable, and some years ago the present trembling pillar became the eccentric one.

NESTOR OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

Napoleon Sarony Was America's Best-Known Photographic Artist.

Napoleon Sarony, who died in New York the other day, was probably the best known of American photographers. Certain it is that no other artist in the country had for his subjects more distinguished men and women.

Mr. Sarony was born in Quebec in NAPOLEON SARONY.

1821 and early in life evinced a taste for photography. He went to New York when 12 years old and in time became the head of a well-known firm of lithographers. He was successful in this undertaking and in 1858 went to Paris to study art. Through the mismanagement of those in charge of his property he lost everything while in the French capital. He then opened a photographic studio in Birmingham, England, and in 1866 returned to New York. He opened a studio in the metropolis, which he had since conducted. The excellence of his work made him known throughout this country and Europe, and many of the famous personages of recent years have sat for him. Among some of the best portraits are those of Peter Cooper, William Cullen Bryant, Henry W. Longfellow, Edwin Forrest and John McCullough. All the great American and foreign actors and actresses have been his subjects, as well as statesmen and other celebrities of world-wide reputation. Mr. Sarony also became renowned for his exquisite character drawings.

THE LARGEST DIAMOND.

It Weighs 3,083 Carats, and Has Been Discovered in Brazil.

The largest carbon ever found in the world has been discovered in the wilds of Brazil. It weighs 3,083 carats, and is almost as big as one's fist. The carbon is a much-sought stone. It is black, of diamondiferous composition, and is the hardest known substance. For this reason it is used for drilling, and is extremely valuable. Small bits are found frequently in diamondiferous regions. The carbon is 3½ inches long by 3 inches wide. It is in Paris

HEIR TO $100,000,000.

Willie K. Vanderbilt Is the Biggest Prize in the Matrimonial Market.

The richest marriageable youth of the New York smart set is William K. Vanderbilt Jr., the eldest son of William K. Vanderbilt. He is now 20 years old and it takes more money to support him than any other young man of his age in Christendom. Willie, as he is called, is the heir to $100,000,000, and there are many knowing ones who place the figure much higher. While he has a brother, Harold, aged 14, it is believed his father will follow the lead of his grandfather and father, the late William H. Vanderbilt, and leave the bulk of his fortune to his elder son. Harold will probably have to put up with a paltry $10,000,000.

"Willie" is particularly off-hand, unassuming, hail-fellow well-met in his ways. He is now only passably good-looking, but gives promise of being much handsomer five years hence. He is about five feet nine inches tall now. His shoulders are rather broad for his age. Willie Vanderbilt, aside from his money, is sure to make friends. He is so simple in his habits, ways and customs that it is assuredly not his fault that it takes a good many thousand dollars a month to keep him going.

During the past summer, for example, he resided at the Marble House, Newport. This dwelling, the outer shell of which cost $1,000,000, was presented to his mother, now Mrs. Oliver H. P. Belmont, by her then husband, William K. Vanderbilt, on a birthday anniversary a few years ago. Some time in advance of his reaching there last July the housekeeper and a large staff of domestics were on hand to prepare for Willie. There were but thirty-five servants, all told, within doors, this being considered a sufficient supply. Then, of course, there were the men in the stables to care for the horses and take charge of the numerous traps at Willie's disposal when he was inclined to drive. Young Vanderbilt is now at Yale College.

THE IMP SEE-SAW.

Readily Constructed, and the Little Fellows Cut Up Queer Pranks.

Take two heated pins and stick them into the center of a candle at right angles to the wick, which should be left exposed at both ends. Then rest the pins on the edges of two wine glasses and trim the candle to balance. Light the wick, and beyond the flame at each end, by means of a piece of wire, fasten two little figures with their joints hinged. Now, as the candle begins to melt, a drop of grease will fall from one end (it is advisable, by the way, to put something beneath to catch it in), and that end of the candle will rise a little above the other. Then a drop will fall from the opposite end and a gentle oscillation will begin, until the little figures at the end will perform the most surprising antics at their game of see-saw.

Victoria's Magnificent State Coach.

Her majesty's state coach is the most superb carriage ever built. It is used only upon the rarest state occasions, and since 1861 has not left the royal mews at Buckingham Palace. The carriage was designed by Sir William Chambers, and in every part is richly ornamented with laurel and carved work, beautifully gilt. Its entire length is 24 feet, its height 12 feet, and the weight of the whole four tons.

A Pensioner of the War of 1812.

Mrs. Susan Slocum, of Newport, R. I., who has just celebrated the ninetieth anniversary of her birth, is one of the few pensioners of the war of 1812, her husband, George Slocum, having served as a drummer boy for the home guards who marched across the beaches and frightened off a British transport.

TRUTH CANNOT DIE.

THE FREE COINAGE OF SILVER WILL YET WIN.

It Is Sound American Doctrine and Orthodox Democratic Doctrine—Tariff Tax or Gold Bonds Confront Republicans—Bryan Has Won Fame.

Wait for 1900.

To silver men who have borne the brunt of battle we offer our congratulations on their courageous charge against the citadel of greed, and bid them good cheer. The question has not been settled. Truth never dies. The conscience of the people will yet awaken to the enormity of the gold power's offense against civilization. And when it does Mammon will be dethroned. Too much blood was spilled in saving this Union to permit a belief that it can be debauched forever by the money power.

Pennsylvania's great tribune, Jeremiah S. Black, said twenty years ago, when the people's will was balked and Samuel J. Tilden was swindled, or rather the American people were swindled, out of the presidency: "Wait. It is only four years. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small; wait."

If the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 was sound doctrine yesterday, it is sound doctrine to-day. If it were true in July, 1896, it will be true in July, 1900. And it is sound doctrine. It is American doctrine; it is orthodox Democratic doctrine. Four years hence, on the same platform—perhaps with the same candidate—we cannot lose. Take up the burden that a gold standard has placed upon your backs and bear it for a season.

Silver men of the United States will yet be vindicated and the cause will triumph. Our faith is pinned to American citizenship. The voice of the people is the voice of God. If it is in error sometimes, it means well at all times. We believe that it will yet awaken to the true interest of the nation, and that in a few years Right will prevail.—Chicago Dispatch.

Tariff Tax or Gold Bonds.

Republican papers are now demanding that President McKinley convene an extra session next spring for the consideration of the tariff question. General Tracy, in an interview, declares that the crying need of the hour is an increase of taxes.

It is almost always the case that increased taxes follow on a Republican triumph, but in the present case it is a question whether even a new tariff tax can save the Government from constant borrowing of money, at interest, to meet expenses, and to keep up the gold standard. Nor is it at all certain that the administration can force through the next Congress a McKinley tariff, in any event. The silver Republicans of the Senate gave notice, when the Dingley bill came before them, that they would vote for no tariff change without free coinage, and McKinley's policy may run against the same impediment. He cannot expect help from Democratic Congressmen, who, if they are wise, would welcome an extra session as an opportunity to re-form their party lines and unite their divided forces.

There is also the fact to be taken into consideration that the practical abandonment of the tariff as an issue, in the recent campaign, has let into the lower House of Congress a number of Republican members who are by no means in accord with McKinley in his extreme protectionist views.

It therefore seems very possible that, in spite of the denunciations heaped upon President Cleveland for his bond issue policy by the Republican press and orators, President McKinley may find himself driven to the same resource before he has been in office many months.

A Suborned Press.

In his final address to the American people Chairman Jones included among the causes of Democratic defeat "the subornation of a large portion of the American press." The part played by the metropolitan press in the recent campaign will not soon be forgotten by the American people. But its behavior since the election has been even worse than during the campaign.

In generous minds the consciousness of being victorious brings out a spirit of magnanimity, or at least a disposition to treat fairly defeated opponents. In the desire to curry favor with its plutocratic masters, the suborned press has since the election surpassed anything in the previous history of American politics or journalism in the brutality of its abuse and in the viciousness of its blackguardism.

Dispatches from other cities show that the same tirade of foul and vindictive abuse that was poured upon the Post-Dispatch was directed against every Democratic newspaper, in every city, that dared to question the figures of the Gould-Sage returning board. In San Francisco, in Cincinnati, in Louisville, in Indianapolis—wherever there was a Democratic newspaper that preferred the view of the Democratic National Committee to that of the irresponsible senders of doctored dispatches—it was the object of frenzied denunciation which amounted to an incitement to riot.

In Chicago it was worst of all. The Democrats had no newspaper there to serve as a target for the newspaper clamor. So it was turned against Chairman Jones. His treatment by the Chicago newspapers on Wednesday and Thursday was a disgrace to American journalism and to the American people. Because he would not join the Hanna chorus, but announced his intention to wait for full and trustworthy returns before conceding Bryan's defeat, he was subject to every species of abuse and denunciation that the vocabulary of newspaper hoodlums could produce.

There was no actual riot, because the people refused to respond to their newspaper inciters. But the post-election riot of bad language in the gold standard newspapers was perhaps the worst feature of a campaign that as a whole offers little encouragement to believers in the old-time doctrine that the voice of the people is the voice of God.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The McKinley Dilemmas.

Politicians may well sympathize with the dilemmas surrounding the position of the President-elect. He has three sets of supporters to placate; not as is usually the case only one party. His success has been aided by his own political friends, by bolting Democrats and by Cleveland office-holders. To have these latter removed nilly willy may seem cruel. To select prizes for the Palmer and Buckner men becomes embarrassing. To give everything to Republicans proper would appear ungrateful to allies. Plattites and anti-Plattites, with Warner Miller in the perspective, are already clamoring for pap. Altogether, that rest which the sage of Canton declares he must now seek seems to elude him.

Why shall not McKinley solve his dilemmas by engineering a grand raffle for the main places and let Hanna draw names from a bag and Quay draw titles of officers from another bag simultaneously? The grab bag game has never been tried yet in national politics, and now may be a good time for testing the plan.

Mr. Bryan's Address.

Mr. Bryan has nailed his flag to the mast and has announced that the battle for humanity is still on. His address to the American people is worthy of the man and of the hour. It reflects the character of one great in adversity and noble in defeat. Having closed his remarkable canvass without a mistake, he adopts the manliest course open to him as the chosen leader of an oppressed people. "No personal or political friend," he says, "need grieve because of my defeat. My ambition has been to secure immediate legislation rather than to enjoy the honors of office; therefore, defeat brings to me no feeling of personal loss."

The man who does not recognize the ring of true patriotism in these words is made of the stuff that sees only selfishness in an honorable ambition to attain the presidency. But those who followed the free coinage banner and went down with it in temporary disaster know, if their opponents do not, that love of country and love of power inspires every utterance that emanates or will emanate from the captain of the host during the ensuing four years.

The keynote has been sounded. In 1900 there will be no other proposition before this people than the proposition to reform its monetary policy regardless of what Western Europe may do or think in the matter. Even Mark Hanna himself is of this opinion, as shown by his declaration that the Republican organization must be kept up and the propaganda for a dear dollar and cheap men continued. Whatever other members of his party may think, the organizer of Mr. McKinley's forces and the holder of his notes sees, in the 6,000,000 of votes polled by the common people a menace to plutocracy, a threat against the ascendency of Mammon.

Quick to accept Mr. Bryan's challenge, he will, no doubt, bring to bear on the situation all the arguments that money can buy and ingenuity devise. Gold advocates will tour the country and undertake to show that a people is happiest when it is least prosperous; that the individual thrives when his income is curtailed.

Against this powerful engineery of pelf will be arrayed Truth, without money, patriotism with only that power which comes from a sense of justice. With such a leader and with such a cause victory is only a question of time, and of a comparatively short time. As our late candidate well says:

The year 1900 is not far away. Before that year arrives international bimetallism will cease to deceive; before that year arrives those who have called themselves gold standard Democrats will become bimetallists and be with us or they will become Republicans, and thus, open enemies; before that year arrives trusts will have convinced still more people that a trust is a menace to private welfare and public safety.

Before that year arrives the evils of a gold standard will be even more evident than they are now, and the people, then ready to demand an American financial policy for the American people, will join with us in the immediate restoration of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the present ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation.

Great in Defeat.

Hon. William McKinley, Canton, Ohio—Senator Jones has just informed me that the returns indicate your election and I hasten to extend my congratulations. We have submitted the issue to the American people and their will is law.

W. J. BRYAN.

Nothing in Mr. Bryan's honorable public career becomes him more than his graceful acknowledgment of defeat. After making the most brilliant campaign in the history of the country—after attracting the admiration of the world, he bows to the inevitable and congratulates the people's choice, declaring that the will of the voter is the law of the land.

It is pleasant to reflect that the battle was waged on purely political lines; that nothing of a personal nature entered into the contest, and that both candidates are of irreproachable private character. President McKinley will have no more ardent well wisher than William Jennings Bryan. If it were possible for this country to prosper permanently under a single gold standard the defeated candidate would, no doubt, be a valuable adviser of the new administration. But it is not possible, and under our system of government the party in power does not accept advice from opposition leaders.

A good deal is being said just now about Mr. Bryan's future—and the inquiry is made as to what course he will pursue. His future has already been selected for him by the American people. There is nothing in politics more certain than the fact that he will remain the party's champion and rally the hosts for another charge against the allied armies of Mammon. William Jennings Bryan, who gave battle so magnificently, serene in defeat and defiant before the money power, is the reform idea incarnated; Mark Hanna is the reactionary principle made flesh. An irrepressible conflict is on.

The Good Fight.

The chairman of the National Democratic Committee (Senator Jones) and the chairman of the campaign committee (Mr. D. J. Campau), with their able assistants, are to be congratulated on the splendid fight they made in the cause of the people. They lost the battle, but they lost it with honor. Senator Jones has been at all times courteous and dignified. He has discussed the situation conservatively, and has won the respect of his foes and the admiration of his friends. There has been a minimum of garrulity at Democratic headquarters and a maximum of work, and the result is something of a victory, although the Republican party is restored to power. Practically without funds, the chosen leaders of the people have fought against tremendous odds, the opposition having millions of money at its command. Every true reformer owes a debt of gratitude to the men who held the party banner aloft during the memorable campaign just closed.

Four Months More of Grover.

McKinley will not take office for four months to come, and in the meantime Grover Cleveland will remain President and will have on his hands a Congress one branch of which is overwhelmingly Republican, while in the other there is a majority made up of believers in the free and unlimited coinage of silver. There are, therefore, three opposing bodies in Washington, and they will continue to obstruct one another until their official life ends on the 4th of March next.

There are very few questions on which the three can be expected to agree to work together. The Republican House would like to start on tariff tinkering when it meets next month, and the Senate is willing to let it do so if it agrees to provide for silver coinage at the same time. The President stands ready to veto one or the other separately, or both combined, if he is given the chance, and the two legislative branches are prepared to reject any recommendation about financial or revenue matters that he may recommend.

It is clear, therefore, that on these questions of domestic importance there is sure to be a deadlock during the remaining days of the Cleveland administration and of the Fifty-fourth Congress. On foreign affairs, however, they may pull together, and it is not unlikely that the Cuban situation and a settlement of the Venezuela affair will chiefly engross attention.

The return of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, our Consul General in Cuba, at this time for the purpose of consulting with President Cleveland is presumably the forerunner of a strong Cuban message to Congress. What recommendations will be made in it nobody can, of course, even guess at in view of what surprises our present chief executive has given the country in the past when matters of foreign politics come up.

Of course the Republicans will oppose any very decided action by this government now in either Cuba or Venezuela or Turkey. They want to have whatever glory is to be gained in the handling of these matters for themselves. They fear that any strong policy by the administration during the coming winter will interfere with the development of the artificial business boom that they are so sedulously nursing in order to strengthen themselves with the people.—New York News.

William Jennings Bryan.

The standard bearer of the people in the wonderful canvass—now a part of history—has won undying fame. He has not been elected President—not yet—but he has waged a warfare against corporate greed that can but redound to the good of the nation.

He led the war from the day of his nomination to the hour of his rejection, and not by any spoken word, or by any individual act, in all that time, did he reflect on those who selected him for a champion. He proved himself a giant among men, and to-day he is as noble in defeat as he could have been in victory.

The odds against him were formidable, and he challenged them. He was a volunteer St. George battling against the dragon of organized greed, and although he has not yet slain the monster, he, or those who come after him, will slay it.

This country must not and will not be run by trusts. It has a grander destiny than the enthronement of Pelf. Whatever support the money power may receive from so-called Democrats, whatever encouragement the men who traffic in the people's necessity may secure from legislative bodies for a time, there will be an adjustment by which the masses will finally secure their inheritance.

Bryan is but 36 years old. Whether in its wisdom his party select him to bear the standard or whether the honor falls on another four years from now, he will, in 1900, be as vigorous and as eloquent in his denunciation of wrong and his advocacy of right as he has been in this contest.

Silk Underwear Is Not Healthful

Opinions differ as to the comfort derived from the different materials from which underwear is made, but there is one thing, says a medical contemporary, which admits of no doubt, and this is that while silk is exceedingly warm, soft and pleasant to the flesh, it is at the same time by no means the healthiest substance for the undergarment. In proof of this, practical observation has demonstrated that silk stockings will make the toughest and healthiest feet moist, wet and tender, until walking becomes painful. A silk scarf worn around the neck next the skin will, in nine wearers out of ten, produce sore throat. Silk makes the neck hot and moist, and the first stray breath of cool air that strikes the skin feels like a drop of iced water, and will produce a cold. Silk seems to have the faculty, as contrasted with wool, of opening the pores and inciting perspiration; and if it will do this with the feet and neck there is every reason to believe that it will produce equal susceptibility to cold when worn about the chest and limbs. Those who wear silk stockings invariably have tender feet. The rule that applies to the male applies equally to the female. Silk underclothing may be very comfortable; but perhaps the advocates of dress reform would do as much good if they would discuss carefully the hygienic value of the material, as well as the cut and style, of the undergarment.—London Morning.

Eyes and nose are all more or less affected by cats. Grape Cultivation in China.

French viniculturists are somewhat disturbed by the reports that come from Manchu of the enormous attention that is now given to the cultivation of grapes in Northern China. Heretofore these have been raised only for table use. In 1893 the first attempts were made to manufacture from them wine of ordinary quality and a superior sort of champagne. The results have been so satisfactory that a foreign house determined to secure from the Chinese Government a monopoly of the manufacture of wines from vineyards of Manchu. By an imperial edict this right has been awarded for a long term of years, and a distinguished European expert has been sent to China to take charge of the la plant in process of building in the grape district. French viniculturists are worried by what they consider may be a formidable "yellow invasion" of their market.

YOUNG GIRLS.

Their Conduct and Health Often Mystifies Their Mothers.

Young girls often feel and consequently act, very strangely.

They shed tears without apparent cause, are restless, nervous, and at times almost hysterical. They seem self-absorbed, and heedless of things going on around them. Sometimes they complain of pain in lower parts of body, flushes of heat in head, cold feet, etc.

Young girls are not free from incipient womb troubles.

Mothers should see to it that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is promptly taken; all druggists have it. The girl will speedily be "herself again," and a probable danger be averted. Any information on this subject, or regarding all female ailments, will be cheerfully given free by Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. Write her.

Syrup of Figs

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

A Cycle in Seasons.

In a recent number Nature reproduced a paper read before the Royal Society of New South Wales by H. C. Russell, F. R. S., on the periodic occurrence of good and bad seasons in which the theory of a nineteen year cycle in the weather is advanced, and most ingeniously maintained by evidence from all available historic records. The author not only considers that he has conclusively proved that such a cycle does exist, but he maintains there are reasons for thinking that his is merely the rediscovery of a law that was known to some at least amongst the Hebrews and Egyptians. Thus Elijah's prediction of a drought was 42 X 19 years after that which Moses predicted in Pharaoh's time; while Elisha's prediction was nineteen years after Elijah's; and the great drought in David's time is 19 X 36 years after Pharaoh's.

The author, from the tables that he has prepared, shows that there appears to be two series of droughts, the second series being more intense and relatively shorter than the first series. Taking the droughts which history has recorded between A. D. 900 and 1896, seventy-eight fit into the first series, and eighty-nine into the second, a total of 167 out of 208 on record. Twenty records of B. C. droughts were found, all of which, with one exception, fit into the nineteen years cycle. Great hurricanes, the great frosts of history, all the red rains, and all the droughts that history records, with a very few exceptions, are likewise included in this cycle.

The New Power.

Nicola Tesla has, it is asserted, discovered a new power or means of electrical application, which he describes as follows: "The whole secret lies in my discovery of what is known as the rotating magnet field What it is I cannot explain, neither is it explainable. I can only give the facts which have been discovered through experiment. The discovery of these scientific facts has done entirely away with the commutator which has heretofore been necessary on all electric motors. This commutator, with its close adjustment, delicate and intricate parts, has been the cause of all the trouble. A slight injury to this commutator, which may arise from the presence of a drop of water, may destroy the whole machine. The danger is now all done away with by discarding the commutator entirely. This result is accomplished by utilizing the rotating magnet field, which simply means that if a circular metal disk is placed on an axle and brought near the electric coil it will revolve. The disk touches nothing but its own bearings, yet it revolves, and thus produces power. This power is what is used in the new motor." The importance of a discovery of this sort can scarcely be estimated. It will, it is said, revolutionize power, and proclaims the beginning of the decadence of steam.

Ten Stories Underground.

It has been shown that with the aid of air shafts and other appliances quarters a story below ground may be rendered far more comfortable than those above, and with care exercised in the ventilation, such quarters may be made perfect from a sanitary standpoint. If this is so one story below ground, why not three or four, and if two, three or four, why not ten or twelve if necessary? This may solve the problem of economy in building space and do away with the sky-scraping buildings that are everywhere causing unfavorable comment. "It may be a long time hence," says an architect, "but I believe the time will come when there will be as many buildings ten stories underground as there are that number above the surface of the ground." This sounds chimerical, but perhaps it is not.

A Peculiar City.

Fish City, which belongs to the State of Michigan, is an odd place with a watery flavor; it has no existence in summer, but is a busy place in winter, is not built on land and yet has nothing to do with boats. The ice of Saginaw Bay is used as a foundation for the city every winter, and the town is occupied by men and their families, who catch, clean and pack whitefish and lake trout for the market. It is built in the same cove every winter, the houses being constructed of rough pine boards. It had a population of nearly three thousand in the winter of 1893-94, nearly twice that number last winter, and this season the population has taken another jump forward.

Sweetness and Light.

Put a pill in the pulpit if you want practical preaching for the physical man; then put the pill in the pillory if it does not practise what it preaches. There's a whole gospel in Ayer's Sugar Coated Pills; a "gospel of sweetness and light." People used to value their physic, as they did their religion,—by its bitterness. The more bitter the dose the better the doctor. We've got over that. We take "sugar in ours"—gospel or physic—now-a-days. It's possible to please and to purge at the same time. There may be power in a pleasant pill. That is the gospel of THOSE who have never been down to their last dollar, who have never been forced unwillingly to borrow, and have never pursued that process with the "private bankers" of a large city, little appreciate the experience of those who have worried by day and tossed sleeplessly by night, puzzling over a financial problem uppermost in mind—not a ratio of 16 to 1, but at a rate of 5 per cent. a month safely clinched to the satisfaction of the money lender by a mortgage on the bit of property of the uneasy student of finance.

To all upon whom the disagreeable necessity, for some reason or other, has devolved, a day among the Shylocks of Chicago will be no novelty, and they never forget the ordeal that is undergone.

To sit in a well-appointed office, the furnishings of which bespeak opulence, and barter for a loan with men hardened to withstand the distress of others, who steel themselves against any feeling of pity that might come upon them, and calmly—one almost might say cruelly—state in sharp yet polite terms their rates for the use of their gold, is an experience few people might choose to undergo, and yet, day by day, the chroniclers of news announce the results of the relentless energy of the usurers. A short time ago an account was published of the commitment of a young man to an insane asylum. Friends and relatives of the poor unfortunate did not hesitate to assert that his mind had become unbalanced owing to his inability to meet certain obligations due as interest on borrowed money at the ruinous rate of 8 per cent. per month.

When a customer approaches one of the shylocks, he is made to feel that money is scarce, that it is no favor to loan it even at exorbitant interest, and the money lender invariably shrugs his shoulder dubiously, even if the security offered is unquestionable. Should the applicant want $100 on household furniture the same must have cost at least five times the amount desired. He must execute a cut-throat chattel mortgage upon it, signed by his wife as well as himself; he must insure it for half its value and transfer the policy to the lender, and the mortgage is so drawn that the mortgagee practically owns the security, and can take possession of it, if the borrower fails to pay interest or principal to the minute agreed upon.

The usual charge advertised is 2½ per cent. a month. When the applicant comes to the point, he is informed that "this especial money belongs to a client," who insists on double that amount. Then the loaner must make his commission—there is, besides the insurance charges, a fee for drawing up the mortgage, a further fee for recording it, and this amount, together with the first month's interest, is deducted from the gross sum. The borrower receives generally about ninety dollars, and is lucky if by some hocus-pocus he has not been persuaded to pay an average of 7 or 8 per cent. for the ensuing six months.

These money sharks loan on all kinds of personal property. Occasionally they cash an exceedingly well indorsed note—oftener they loan on watches, diamonds, silverware. If money is advanced on a piano alone, they demand possession, and here comes in their new charge for "storage." Once a victim is in their clutches, they try to keep him there, and when the first mortgage runs out threaten to foreclose and sell the security at a sacrifice, unless a liberal renewal fee is paid. Cases are known where in an instance of this kind a borrower was frightened and forced into paying what amounted to 38 per cent. a month. When the shylock finds his customer behind in his interest, he gives no warning of his intentions. He sends trusty but unscrupulous employes, who seize the furniture, if such is the security, hurry it away into hiding, and when the owner has managed to obtain the money to redeem it, he is either told that it has been sold according to law to satisfy the mortgage, or is compelled to settle on a basis of foreclosure charges, moving charges, storage charges, custodian's charges, release charges, until a review of the cost of the entire transactions shows that he has very nearly paid cent for cent for the use of his money for less than a year.

"I WILL CHARGE YOU EIGHT PER CENT. INTEREST PER MONTH."

Story of a Parasol.

In the history of the umbrella is told a story of a beautiful fringed green-silk parasol of the time of the French Restoration.

One summer afternoon more than seventy years ago two pleasant-looking people sat in rented chairs in the Champs watching the passers-by and enjoying the beautiful day. The gentleman looked as if he might be a prosperous tradesman; the young woman was beautifully dressed and very attractive in appearance.

When they rose to go away the gentleman found that he had no money. The woman who owned the chairs stormed and scolded, and denounced them as swindlers, until, to pacify her, the gentleman took the lady's parasol, an exquisite affair of green silk, fringe, and with a rosewood handle, and gave it to her. He handed her one of the lady's yellow gloves also, and said:

"Keep the parsol as a pledge of what I owe you, and do not give it up to anyone unless he shows you the mate to that glove."

Then he and the lady walked away across the Place de la Revolution and the Boulevard de la Madeleine. Suddenly rain began to fall. There were no carriages passing. The couple hurried into a doorway.

Immediately the concierge of the house came out and invited them into his office. He gave them chairs, and offered them, if they did not wish to wait until the rain was over, the loan of his fine green-serge umbrella. The gentleman accepted these attentions gratefully, and he and the lady made their way through the rain under the borrowed umbrella.

An hour later a footman in livery returned to the good-natured concierge his umbrella, with a gift of several bank-notes and the compliments of the Duc de Berri, nephew of the king.

Then going to the Champs Elysees the footman sought out the ungracious renters of chairs, and, displaying a yellow glove, said, "You recognize this glove, madame? Here are eight sous sent you by the Duc de Berri to redeem the Princess Caroline's parasol."

Cutting a Figure.

In recent years, says a Western paper, we have heard a great deal about the millions of tramps, the millions out of work, and the starving millions or pauperized millions. Heaven knows the number is large enough without exaggerating it. Let the men who talk thus use a little common sense, and they will cut down their figures 75 per cent. We have never had anywhere near a million tramps in this country; while as for criminal outlaws—that is, confirmed criminals—men who live by crime—outside of the penitentiaries, it is doubtful if there are 5,000 in the whole country.

White Skies.

An astronomer says that the sky is whiter over the cultivated than over the uncultivated portions of the earth's surface, because a good deal of coarse dust is present in the atmosphere in the former instance, with the result that a larger proportion of white light is diffused.

Feline Subject for the Keeley Cure.

There is a cat in Chattanooga that should take the Keeley cure. He came to a saloon as a kitten and acquired the habit when thirsty, of drinking the beer that dropped from the faucet of the cooler. He did not like it very well at first, but the habit grew on him, and soon all that was there would be lapped up, and the cat would then curl up and sleep off the effects of his potations. Finally the bartenders would draw saucers of beer for him and the cat would stagger about the room unmistakably drunk. Occasionally he will go on sprees, and for days together it seems as though he could not get enough. After taking a zigzag course over the house he will curl up and go into a drunken stupor for hours. No signs of delirium tremens have been seen yet, but considerable curiosity is manifested by habitues of the place as to how long he can keep up his present rather rapid pace.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

A Mad King.

King Otto of Bavaria is incurably mad, being afflicted with that form of insanity called "mathesis," and which, like that ascribed in Biblical history to Nebuchadnezzar, takes the form of the victim imagining himself to be either a bird or an animal. Other royal lunatics are the Archduchess Maximilian of Austria, better known as the ex-Empress Carlotta of Mexico; Emperor William's mother-in-law, the Dowager Duchess of Schleswig-Holestein-Augustenburg, and Archduke Leopold of Austria. The reigning Prince of Lippe is likewise a madman and under restraint, as is also ex-Sultan Murad of Turkey.

Spain's Royal Family Guards.

At 12 o'clock every night the Monteros, who watch over the sleeping King of Spain, issue through secret panels in the walls of the palace and take up their stations, each royal personage having at least one of these to guard him or her through the night. The men are clad in mail, and wear felt shoes; and a body of them promenade the corridors regularly until 7:30 in the morning. When the royal family is awakened the watchers disappear as silently as they came.

Fanny Davenport.

One of the famous and successful actresses of the American stage is Fanny Davenport, who comes from old theatrical stock. She was born in London in 1852, but was educated in Boston, where her father was born. She appeared on the stage when only 13 years old, and has since retained a warm corner in the hearts of theater-goers. Her impersonations are numerous, and it is her intention to encourage American playwrights by acting their pieces.

Another Smart Woman.

My husband is poor but proud and he does not want me to work, as I have nothing to do I get restless, and after reading in your paper Mrs. Russell's experience selling self-heating flatirons I concluded I would try it. I wrote to J. F. Casey & Co., St Louis Mo., and they treated me so nicely that I felt very much encouraged. As soon as I got my sample iron I started out, and sold 8 irons the first day clearing $12. I have not sold less than 8 any day since, and one day I sold 17. I now have $226 clear money, and my husband does not know I have been working at all, but I am afraid he will be mad when I tell him. Have I done right or should I quit work and leave him to struggle alone.

AN ANXIOUS WIFE.

You are doing just right, your husband should be proud of you, go ahead and show the world what an energetic woman can do. That self-heating iron must be a wonderful seller, as we hear of so many that are succeeding sellling it. 2

A Chance to Make Money.

I read how one of your subscribers make money selling Dishwashers; I ordered one, and my lady friends were charmed, as they hate dish washing. My brother and I commenced selling them, and have made $1,700 after paying all expenses. We don't canvass any. Our sales are all made at home. People come or send for them. The Mound City Dish Washer is the best Dishwasher on the market. Our business is increasing, and we are going to keep right on, until we make ten thousand dollars. We sell from 5 to 15 machines every day. The Dishwasher is lovely, every housekeeper wants one. There is no excuse to be poor when so much money can be made selling Dishwashers. For full particulars, address The Mound City Dish Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. They will start you on the road to success.—A reader. 2

Grain Etc.

L. J. Miller reports prime new wheat worth 84 cents to-day, and old wheat is worth 88. There is a little grain coming in all the time but the total is not large, as much of the old wheat had to be sold before prices came up. The new crop was not a large one, and a good share of was spoiled by the wet weather. The wheat injured by wet, sells down very low, at about 50 to 70 cents according to quality. Mr. Miller says the corn crop is large, but prices are low. By the car load, it would not be more than 18 cents. He has been offered a car load of prime Michigan potatoes at 22 cents. In fact all farm produce but wheat is way down. Wheat is likely to keep up as long as the famine lasts in Idia, or at least till they get food enough to last them till the next crop shows how it will yield.

Growing Wheat.

In talking with several farmers within the last three weeks we learn that considerable damage has been done to the growing wheat, by the "fly" as it is called. We are told of several fields in Butler township and other parts of the county, that were ruined and the fields had to be sown over again or left bare for a spring crop. Of course, the great bulk of the new wheat looks well, as the frequent rains kept it growing. Between plowing time and threshing time, a wheat crop runs a great many risks.

Same Thing.

"Gold is getting plenty" the gold standard papers keep saying. Gold always has been plenty. Is anyone silly enough to think the election of McKinley has coined any gold? We said all along, that there was as much money of all kinds as ever, and if anyone was foolish enough to hoard it, that was their fault, not the fault of the democrats. And if they were foolish enough to think gold would rise if Bryan was elected, they deserve to lay out of the use of their money for several months. Had Bryan won, it would have been just as it is now. They would find gold standing as it did before and would bring it out into circulation as they are now doing.

Busy Scene.

Ordinarily, it would make a printer's mouth water to talk to him of a job of printing 300 millions of pieces on one contract. And that is the sort of "take" Bro. Downey of the Albion Democrat has just now. He is working this job for our respected "Uncle Sam." It is on a contract he captured five months ago, by underbidding large establishments in the big cities, and includes all the little tags, slips and labels used in postoffices and on postal cars in the entire United States, if we understand it rightly. This is a big country, and 300 million pieces is a big job, but he has twelve months in which to do the work. At present, we believe he is behind, with the work, a trifle of about 70 millions. But that is not so great a matter ofter all, when we consider the facilities he has now for doing the work. He runs all the time, two rapid cylinder presses, the forms for which are prepared by several men, so as to be ready without delay when one form is done. And one man has his hands full to cut up the sheets into separate slips with a power cutter, which he feeds continually. It is a busy scene from the printing to the tying up and labeling the packages, and about every other day a big wagon load is sent to the express or freight office. Bro. Downey's mail has swelled to so bulky a volume that the salary of the lucky postmaster has been raised $250, and Bro. Downey himself has to employ a lady assistant to help open and care for his letters. He has almost forgotten that he is a defeated candidate for a state office at the recent election, so busy is he with this contract. Of course he took it very sheap—how cheap we are not certain, but have heard that it was at 1½ cents per 1000 slips. But even at that, the job would amount to $3,750. And whether there is any money in or not, looking at the work going on, makes one half beleve that the "advance agent of prosperity" has reached Albion. and that Bro. Drowney is his prophet.

An exchange says that one of the best things a person can do is to eat apples just before going to bed, on account of phosphoric acid contained. Among other things which it does, it thoroughly disinfects the mouth. Why was not this remedy made known while the campaign was in progress? There was a "crying need" for something of his kind then.

State Debt Reduced.

FINANCE BOARD AUTHORIZES ANOTHER PARMENT AMOUNTING TO $200,000.

The state finance board met at Indianapolis and authorized the treasurer to pay off $1,200,000 of state bonds upon which the state holds an option. In the last two years $1,200,000 of the state debt has been liquidated and there is now left in the neighborhood of $6,000,000 of funded debt, with no floating debt. In the auditor's office it is estimated that if the tax laws continue to be enforced as they are at present the state debt can, with the same low tax levy that now exists, be wiped out within the next eight years. The reduction of the debt during the last two years has caused a heavy reduction in the interest charges, for nearly all the high-priced outstanding bonds have been taken up and those now out bear a low rate of interest.

Big Power.

Sunday night at Midnight the great power works at Niagara Falls were set in operation. The power is obtained by a side ditch above the falls and this lets the water into a hole drilled down through the rock, giving the necessary fall on the water wheels at the foot of the cliffs. The work has been going on many years at a heavy expense. But it will pay as there is no dam to break and no expense after the machinery is fairly running, except for the men needed to care for the machinery. It can furnish electric light power for several large cities at almost any distance.

Business Sense.

Japan has established a steamship line between that country and the United States. This is a wise move on their part and in contrast to the bad policy of the United States and our people. As soon as the republican party was fairly settled in power thirty years ago they neglected our shipping interests, and even made tariff laws to kill it off. It has been going since from bad to worse as the "protection" policy had led our ship builders to believe they would get a big bounty from government, if they would refuse to put out ships without it. Two democratic administrations have made feeble attempts to start up our shipping interests again, but seem to have got tired and laid down. Now it seems, as if little Japan would head us off. We need more business sense and less buncombe in congress.

Wouldn't Be So.

How often we have been told that if Bryan was elected there would be no business on railroads, in factories, in mining, in banking, in mercantile pursuits, etc, etc. Now that the heat of the campaign is over, how foolish all this looks. It would mean:

That no one would travel on railroads, and no freight would be carried, nor iron be used to repair track, no trackmen to keep it in repair, and no cars or engines to keep it up.

There would be no clothing used, nor food, no buggies bought, no groceries needed, no wool or cotton worked into cloth, no coal used for fuel, no steam or electricity, no use for money or bankers. This would rot at their warves, grass would grow in the streets and farms go back to weeds and trees. Men and women would have to go barefoot, because no shoes would be made or sold. Newspapers would cease their weekly visits as no one could afford to take them, although there would be plenty of time to read. And so on through a long list of thousands of things and conditions. And with one accord we all now say. "How foolish it all was."

They cure old, advanced cases too; but not so many, nor so promptly. The New Hook Spoon Free to All.

I read in the Christian Standard that Miss A M Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

Jailed.

Clint North, of Butler, came over and eat Thanksgiving dinner with Sheriff Stroh. Clint had been on a drunk and was fined, and in default of payment he was sent to jail to serve 14 days.

24 to 1.

It is a poor week that brings no new term to public favor. This week it is due to the hunting season. On Thanksgiving, yesterday, everybody who could walk and get credit for a stotgun, was out in the woods and fields within a radius of several miles from Auburn. But the game had apparently read the numerous items of the coming holiday in the DAILY, and all were evidently preserving a modest firement under the home shelter. And so it was, that twelve hunters with empty gamebags, and stomachs to conform, met in a field not for from Auburn. They compared notes, while resting their wearied guns on manly shoulders. There were not many stories of hair breadth escapes, and not a nimrod trophy in the crowd. And the poet of the company was just repeating Pope's famous lines:

"From covered hedge the whirring
pheasant springs,
And mounts triumphant on exultant wings."

When "birrr"—"whirrr," went a pheasant from a near by cover, sailing right out in front of the whole twelve men. Twelve guns sprang to as many shoulders, and twelve "bangs," rang out on the warm autumn air, followed by twelve more bangs, of the same quality and quantity. And the bird went soaring off to its forest home, every feather in place, where he made report, "They never teched me." Twelve weary and sad-eyed men turned homeward. They never smiled again——till they got home.

Stands at the Head.

Aug J. Bogel, the leading druggist of Shreveport, La., says: "Dr. King's New Discovery is the only thing that cures my cough, and it is the best seller I have." J. F. Campbell, merchant of Safford, Ariz. writes: "Dr. King's New Discovery is all that is claimed for it; it never fails and is a sure cure for Consumption, Coughs and Colds. I cannot say enough for its merits Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds is not an experiment. It has been tried for a quarter of a century and to-day stands at the head. It never disappoints. Free trial bottles at, Robbins & McCord's Drug Store. 1

A Dandy Thing to Sell!

I have been doing so well this summer selling combination dippers that I think it is my duty to tell others about it. I have not made as much money as some I read about, but I never made less than $3 and often $5 a day; the dipper can be used as a fruit jar filler; a plain dipper; a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that it sells at nearly every house, as it is so cheap. You can get a sample by sending, as I did, 18 two-cent stamps to pay postage, etc., to W. H. Baird & Co., Station A, Pittsburg. Pa, and they will mail you a dipper, and you can go right to work. Any one can make $3 or $4 a day anywhere. A READER. tf

Misleading.

"The business world has taken on a decided boom since the election and the indications are that there will be a big rivival in all branches of trade during the next few months. Banking institutions have commenced to pay out their long hoarded gold, manufacturing establishments which have long been idle, are at work, and others have placed employes on full time who for a year have been employed on short hours. These conditions, existing as they do in all portions of the country, are bound to accrue to the benefit of the entire people and in many homes where there has been fear of a hard winter and much suffering there is happiness and a feeling of comfort. It is to be hoped that these improved conditions will be permanent. Temporary relief can only make any future hardships so much the harder to meet and aud bear for these reasons every effort should be used to make permanent the slowly improving conditions of business and trade. Prosperity will make confidence and happiness."

The above is misleading. Few signs of business revival have really shown themselves so far. The worst feature is that the most of the trouble before as well as the revival after, is artificial and not at all necessary. We understand our own factories will start up next week and we shall be glad of it.

Snug as a Bug.

Any boy who can't find a new way to put in his odd hours, would be a conundrum. Auburn boys are as inventive as the best of their kind. Witness the cosy little hut on the creek bottom occupied by four Auburn lads, at spare hours. Walking across the bottom to-day, our informant noticed a little hut near the edge of the water, and going there saw there was a boat with a very practical little landing for its convenience. There were signs of life about, and a pleasant looking smoke was curling up from a stove pipe in the roof of the cabin. He rapped at the door, and was admitted, and received most politely by the occupants, who were Charlie Borst, Cory Snyder, Fred Fell and Miss Brandon's little adopted son. All were partners in the institution and "Nibs" Refner, was present as a visitor. They had a stove, and everything was as cosy as a "hunter's camp" could be. On the wall hung a big Winchester, one shot of which would almost send the whole outfit over into Ohio. The landing was used to unload wood, which they went up the creek to get, bringing it home in the boat. The day was pretty cold, but the boys did not mind that, and as they are well behaved and honorable lads, we have no doubt they enjoy themselves very properly. It is the abuse only, of youthful pleasures and amusements that makes them harmful. A proper amount of innocent recreation harms no one.

ELECTRIC BITTERS.

Electric Bitters is a medicine suited for any person, but perhaps more generally needed in the Spring, when the languid exhausted feeling prevails, when the liver is torpid and sluggish and the need of a tonic and alterative is felt. A prompt use of this medicine has often averted long and perhaps fatal bilious fevers. No medicine will act more surely in counteracting and freeing the system from the malarial poison. Headache, Indigestion Constipation, Dizziness yield to Electric Bitters. Only fifty cents per bottle at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store.

None Equal to Dr Hand's Says Mr.

Nelsonville; O., Dec. 20, '93.—Dr. Hand.—Dear Sir;—"I have been using your remedies for my children for over four years, I have used many other medicines but have found none equal to your. Have recommended Dr. Hand's Colic Cure to many other mothers and persuaded them to try it; they all say it proves satisfactory. I am the mother of nine children and am never without a bottle of all of Dr. Hand's Remedies in the house." At Fischler & Son's 1

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. A Generous Gift.

The Zimmerman Mfg. Co. made glad the hearts of their employes Thanksgiving by sending each one of them who were married, a fine chicken. Mr Zimmerman informs us that in all about twenty-five or thirty chickens were disposed of. The donation was highly appreciated by their men.

County Teachers.

The annual meeting is held to-day and to-morrow in Henry's Opera House with an unusually large attendance. About 150 were present this afternoon about half being visitors from among the town people. Mrs. Bemenderfer, is president, and very interesting work is being done. Mrs. Cuppy sang a song this afternoon, and there were lessons and work. The session continues to-morrow. Among the teachers here to-day, were A. C. Kœppe, of Newville, and H. E. Coe, of Butler.

Disreputable.

It has taken the Clipper ten years to do up the Courier, but it has done it to a finish.—Garrett Clipper, Nov. 19, 1896.

Shades of our immortal Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and all the patron saints of Democracy, what think you of this! A pretending democratic paper boasting with "ghoulish glee" of spending ten long years like a sleuth-hound in its best endeavor to "do up" another democratic paper, and one too that can scarcely be considered a rival in a business sense. With such a demoniac spirit in our midst, whose business or reputation is safe, if perchance you should offend it. The blood-hounds used by the slave drivers of the south in antebellum days, were merciful as compared to this mongrel cur, whose wind of hate is good for a ten year chase. Think of it! To be followed thus for ten years—and for what? and by whom? Should not this appeal to all men, no matter what may be their political or religious opinions, especial if they are in any way responsible for its existence. (Garrett Herald Nov. 27, 1896.

The above item from the Garrett Herald is clipped as a very fitting answer to a lying statement recently put out by the Garrett Clipper during one of the editor's semi-lucid spells between his periodical drunks. About so often he reports that the COURIER is sold out or is busted, and such slush. There is not and never has been a word of truth in these statements and we would not even think of denying them, did they not appear among a few who do not know the facts. We never read the Clipper and did not know of this particular screed till our attention was called to it.

A TEXAS CYCLONE.

One Mile Wide and Eight Miles in Length.

A special dispatch from Waco, Tex., says that a cyclone raged twenty miles from here, and devastated a strip one mile wide and eight miles in length. A number of farm houses were demolished in the vicinity of Mart, McLennon County, and information comes from Reisel, six miles from Mart, that the residence of Buck Douglass was totally destroyed, his wife severely hurt, and one of his children killed outright. Five persons were more or less injured as far as heard from. The temperature ranged nearly at summer heat prior to the storm. In passing over the prairie the cyclone took away everything it touched, leaving the earth bare of grass.

Cable Scheme Turned Down.

A special from Honolulu per steamer City of Peking says: The matter of the Pacific Cable franchise, which has been laid before the executive several times by John W. Foster, was brought to a focus on the 14th inst., when it was discussed before the President and Cabinet by a number of influential citizens. President Dole stated that a new arrangement had been proposed by Colonel Spaulding and his colleagues, and before taking definite action the government had deemed it advisable to consult with the business men of the city.

Girl's Horrible Death.

Driven to desperation by her shame, Katie Klindinhurst, a 19-year-old girl, sought a horrible death at Stoverstown, Pa. She went into a cornfield on her father's farm, set fire to one of the shocks of fodder, and threw herself into the flames. Before she had entirely accomplished her end she was discovered and carried home. Medical aid was summoned, but she was burned beyond all help, and a few hours afterward she died.

A Bloodless Duel.

A dispatch to the London Telegraph says that the Marquis De Montmort and an American named J. A. Hutchinson became involved in a violent dispute a short time ago, which resulted in a challenge to fight a duel being sent and accepted. The duelists met at Maisons Lafitte, near Paris, and exchanged six shots from pistols at twenty-five paces. Neither of the men was injured.

Hurled Around a Shaft.

While Roy Favors, 14 years old, was manipulating the "crabs" on a derrick, near Greensburg, Ind., he was caught in the machinery and was whirled around a shaft, finally falling to the ground. His clothing was stripped off with the exception of a sock on his left foot, several bones were broken, and the body was otherwise mutilated. He was dead when workmen reached his side.

Town Nearly Burned Up.

Seattle (Wash.) special: Nearly the entire business portion of the town of Leavenworth, the headquarters of the Cascade division of the Great Northern Railroad, was burned. Leavenworth is located in the eastern slope of the Cascade Mountains, and is a thriving town of about one thousand people, inhabited by railroad men and miners.

Still Ablaze.

Price (Utah) special: The Gilson asphaltum mine at Fort Duchene is still burning fiercely. All attempts so far to extinguish the flames have been unavailing. Work is now being directed to the air shaft in the hope that by cutting off the air the fire can be brought under control. The entire underground workings of the mine have been burned.

Another Massacre.

The London Daily News publishes a dispatch from Constantinople saying that another massacre of Armenians is reported to have occurred in the vicinity of Diarbekir. It is said that more than 500 persons were killed.

Elevator Burned.

At Farmington, Minn., the Ermpy & Woodard elevator was destroyed by fire. Over 40,000 bushels of grain is almost a total loss. The elevator was only slightly insured and the loss is about $30,000.

Killed By a Low Bridge.

Charles Barnett of Crawfordsville, was killed near Lafayette, Ind., riding on top of a Monon passenger train. His head struck a bridge and his skull was crushed.

Murdered Her Childen.

Tacoma (Wash.) special: In the foothills of Mount Tacoma, fifty miles from the nearest physician, Mrs. A. B. Swenier cut the throats of her three children, and then cut her own throat. The children were aged 5 and 3 years, and the baby 9 months. The baby may recover.

Dynamited a Church.

An attempt was made to blow up the Catholic Church at Bolivar, Ohio, with dynamite. The large cartridge failed to explode, but the church was partly destroyed by a smaller one.

Queen Wilhelmina to Marry.

Prince Luigi of Savoy, a nephew of King Humbert of Italy, who is at present in Boston harbor on board the Italian cruiser Cristoforo Colombo, has received word from his home that his brother Victor has been betrothed to Queen Wilhelmina of Holland.

Must Have Been Asleep.

Charlton County, Georgia, held no election and the official digest of the Georgia election has been made up with Charlton left out. Most of the county is in Okepenokee swamp and the people probably did not know anything of the national election.

FIVE CHILDREN BURN.

Missouri Parents Leave Their Home to Go to a Dance.

Five children of Mr. and Mrs. Snyder Neal, living five miles north of Hamilton, Mo., were burned to death late Saturday night. The Neal dwelling was burned while the parents were attending a dance. They had eight children. The oldest, a boy of 15 years, and a baby accompanied the parents to a social party. About 11 o'clock the gathering broke up. Soon after starting home, the Neals, and those accompanying them, discovered that the Neal residence was on fire. When they reached the burning building the father saw his 11-year-old girl lying burning in the front door, clasping her 3-year-old brother in her arms. The flames prevented rescue. The children were then dead. The father fell in a swoon and has been a raving maniac ever since. Nora, 9 years old, is the only survivor of the fire. She says that the children at home, Callie 13, Hattie 11, Willie 7, Clarence 5, Julian 3 and herself, retired at the usual hour in an upstairs chamber. The next she knew the fire was coming through the floor, and the building was enveloped in flames. She says that all six were aroused. She rushed to a second-story window and jumped to the ground, calling to the others to follow, as the fire had cut off escape by the stairway. It is thought the fire was caused by an incendiary.

TRADE GROWING.

Volume of Increase for Two Weeks Past Without Precedent.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review of Trade says: "The gain in volume of business continues entirely without precedent. More than 390 establishments which were idle have started work, and at least 800 have increased their working forces, making 690 concerns which are known to have added largely to the number of hands at work, and these are only part of the whole number. Every day adds thousands to the number of those who are able to buy a week's supplies and make up gradually for many months of enforced economy. Already this brings a great increase in the volume of business, and the clearing house exchanges, for the first time in several years, not only exceed those of last year by 10 per cent., but also exceed those of the same week in 1892 by 9 per cent. Business men are all anxious to prevent anything like fictitious excitement, and nearly all branches have a rise in prices. There is a great demand for supplies, materials and products."

TRAGEDY OF THE SEA.

Wreck of the Big Coast Steamer San Benito.

The steamer San Benito, bound from Tacoma to San Francisco, went ashore seven miles north of Point Arena, Cal., Sunday morning. The steamer struck on a sandbar and broke in two. The San Benito carried forty-four men, and during the severe storm Saturday night must have lost her bearings. Boats were lowered, but one capsized immediately with five men in it, four of whom were drowned. Another boat with four of the crew capsized nine times, losing two men. Three men, by heroic means, reached shore. Daylight found the rest of the crew clinging to the rigging. Such a heavy sea was running that it was impossible to render assistance.

ASKED TO BE MERCIFUL.

President Cleveland Invokes Clemency for a Train Wrecker.

Gov. Budd at Sacramento, Cal., received from President Cleveland a personal plea for the commutation of sentence in the case of Salter D. Worden, under sentence of death for train wrecking in Yale County during the railroad strike of 1894. An engineer and three United States artillerymen were killed in the wreck. The President states, as a ground for his interest in the case, that, while a resident of New York State before his elevation to the presidency, he had formed a great friendship for Worden's mother, a music teacher. Gov. Budd has also received a personal appeal from C. P. Huntington, president of the Southern Pacific, for a commutation of the death sentence.

CLAMORING FOR THEIR PAY.

Ohio Southern Road Likely to Suffer a Big Strike Soon.

The Ohio Southern Railroad is behind in its payments to its men for April and the first eight days in May, 1895, at which time the road went into the hands of a receiver. Now it is behind from Sept. 1 to Nov. 20, aggregating, in some instances, nearly $300. The continued postponement of the sale of the road has made the men desperate, and they say they will have their money or quit. If they go out they will be headed by the Brotherhood of Railway Firemen. The road has in its employ hundreds of men who will go out from every department.

Cubans Are Happy.

A cipher cablegram from Havana Monday night to a Cuban leader at Jacksonville, Fla., says that Gen. Weyler has been forced to return to Havana and that the city is in great confusion. Weyler gives no excuse, it is said, except that it is too hot and unhealthy to do any fighting. It is openly asserted in Havana that Weyler became frightened because Maceo had set a price upon his head or his capture. Weyler's scouts informed him that Maceo might make an attempt on Havana, and the Spanish general retreated in hot haste to the safety of his palace. It is also stated in the cablegram that Weyler's recall is assured now, as the Spanish Government is incensed against him for his dilatory tactics. Cubans are jubilant, for they think this will have a favorable effect upon Congress.

Finally Added to the Navy.

The torpedo boat Ericsson, built at Dubuque, Iowa, by the Iowa Iron Works, has been formally added to the navy, and the final payments made to her builders, including the sums reserved pending her acceptance. In her brief career, since she was launched at the interior port, the Ericsson has had a series of mishaps almost equaling those in the checkered career of the unfortunate battleship Texas.

Chance for American Cattle.

Consul Germain sends word to the State Department from Zurich, Switzerland, that there is a chance to introduce American cattle in Switzerland as a result of the decree excluding all cattle coming from Austria-Hungary, because of disease.

Death of Campanini.

Italo Campanini, the famous tenor, is dead. His demise came while he was visiting Parma, Italy, where he was born fifty years ago. The news of his death came as a great surprise, and was first chronicled in the London newspapers.

Bryan's House Is Quarantined.

The home of W. J. Bryan at Lincoln, Neb., was quarantined Monday for diphtheria, his eldest daughter, Ruth, being ill. The attack is mild and did not prevent Mr. Bryan leaving for Denver.

Spain's Bold Affront.

The Cuban situation is now acute, says a Washington correspondent. The summary trial and conviction of the Competitor prisoners by secret tribunal in a Havana fortress, against the protest of the United States Government, has thrown the State Department into a ferment, and indications point strongly to decided action on the part of the administration. Consul General Lee entered formal protest on behalf of the United States against a military trial of the Competitor prisoners, who were under the American flag when captured, except under conditions that would entitle them to a fair hearing as citizens of the United States. This protest has been ignored, and the State Department has only one recourse, which is to demand the setting aside of this trial and a reopening of the case. A refusal at this time would necessarily bring the relations between Spain and the United States instantly to a war basis. Nothing has occurred since the beginning of the Cuban insurrection which is so full of sensational possibilities as the incident which came to a climax in the conviction of the Competitor's crew, who were under the protection of the American flag. The charge has been made many times of late that Spain was seeking an excuse for a war with the United States as a desperate measure to protect the home administration from overthrow. The arbitrary action of the Spanish military court at Havana would seem to carry out these stories, which have not been believed by the general public, or, for that matter, by the State department.

KILLED BY FOOTPADS.

Rev. Dr. James Miller of Bloomington Murdered at Decatur.

Rev. Dr. James Miller, of Bloomington, grand prelate of the grand commandery of Knights Templar of Illinois, was found dead in a dark alley in Decatur early Tuesday morning. There was an ugly bullet hole in his head and everything indicates that he was foully murdered by footpads and robbed. His pocket were rifled, and his gold watch and pocketbook had been taken. The murder caused the greatest excitement, and every effort is being made to find the person or persons who committed the deed. Rev. Dr. Miller was pastor of the First Methodist Church of Bloomington, one of the largest Methodist churches in Illinois. Formerly he was pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Decatur until he was made presiding elder of the Decatur district of the Illinois conference. Three years ago he resigned this high ecclesiastical position to accept a call to the Marshfield Avenue Methodist Church, Chicago. But his church was not able to retain his services, he being one of the brightest and most popular preachers of his denomination in the entire State. He desired to return to the Illinois conference from the Rock River conference, feeling more at home in the territory where he had so long labored. He then accepted a call to the charge at Bloomington and had been pastor there since then.

DO NOT FAVOR THE BALL.

Washington Pastors Oppose an Inauguration Event.

A crusade has been started among some church-going people of Washington against the quadrennial inaugural ball. This feature is not regarded as an essential part of the official inaugural ceremonies. While the new President and other official dignitaries always attend the function, which originated in an old Southern colonial custom and has latterly resolved itself into a money-making institution, pure and simple, it is not authorized by any official sanction. The receipts from the admission fee of $10 are applied toward defraying the general expenses of the local inauguration committee. Heretofore the inaugural ball has been held in the pension office. This year it has been suggested that the new congressional library be used, but Librarian Spofford entered a protest. His protest is being seconded by a number of pastors of Washington congregations, who desire a free public reception instead.

Important Discovery.

While exploring an onyx cave near Mansfield, Ohio, a party of hunters unearthed four human skulls. It was supposed at first that they were the remains of Indians, but the subsequent discovery of several pieces of pottery and crude instruments of war which it is known were not the handiwork of Indians leaves no doubt that they were the bones of some prehistoric race, probably the mound-builders. The skulls were sent to the Smithsonian Institution at Washington for a further examination.

Susan Ashley's Romance.

Susan Ashley, who was buried the other day at Westfield, Mass., was once a very wealthy woman, she inheriting $5,000,000 when her mother died. She lost her money and opened a barber shop on Madison street, in Chicago, and hung out the sign, "Lady barber." Her daughter still conducts the business.

Threaten to Burn His House.

Lester Witherspoon, president of the Midway turnpike, in Woodford County, Kentucky, has received anonymous notes threatening to burn his home if he continues to collect toll. Meantime toll gates have been raided and chopped down every night for five nights.

FOOTBALL GAMES.

Results of the Gridiron Battles on Thanksgiving Day.

FOOTBALL was everything Thanksgiving Day. The Chicago Athletic Association won from the Boston eleven, 12 to 6. Chicago University won from Ann Arbor, 7 to 6. Northwestern and Wisconsin Universities played a tie. Cornell was beaten by Pennsylvania, 32 to 10. Purdue of Indiana with the University of Illinois, and Iowa and Nebraska, tied. The Coliseum game in Chicago was not won until the time keepers blew their whistles—the Athletic game was won at the beginning, and the Northwestern game was tied with but eight minutes to play. The Coliseum game was lost by poor generalship, the Athlethic game was lost because Boston does not know how to play, and the Evanston game was tied because a skilled man fell in the mud and the ball was slick and slippery with drizzle.

It was a day of surprises. The victors in each of the contests were the losers of the prophets. It was expected that Michigan would eat up the men from Chicago. They earned the championship last year. Their supporters did not make it a question of success, but a matter of score. The Athletic Club had reprimanded its best men for professionalism by dismissal, taking upon the gridiron an eleven of less than two weeks' work. The Northwestern expected to win its fight by a clean margin, and did win it to the last moments. Here is how they stand:

Chicago	7	Michigan	6
Chicago A. A.	12	Boston A. A.	6
Northwestern	6	Wisconsin	6
Pennsylvania	32	Cornell	10
Purdue	4	Lafayette	4
Uni. of Iowa	0	Uni. of Nebraski	0
Brown	24	Indians	12

Comparisons with previous elections for thirty-six years show:

1896—McKinley's popular plurality (approximate)	829,064

From most of the State the figures are official, the results being reported to the World direct by the Secretaries of State. The total Prohibition vote cast will not exceed 80,000. It was highest in Pennsylvania—19,274. In the seventy-seven counties of Texas thus far counted Bryan and Watson received 66,732. The total middle-of-the-road Populist vote will be about 100,000. The Socialist vote was smaller than in 1892. In many States none were cast.

PREACHER AND POISONER.

A St. Paul Minister Has Begun a Six-Year Sentence.

Rev. James C. Hull, who a few months ago was the popular pastor of one of the Methodist churches in St. Paul, now occupies a cell in the Stillwater penitentiary, where he will remain six years unless pardoned before the term of his sentence expires. Mr. Hull was arrested Aug. 5 last at his home in West St. Paul. His wife suspected that he was trying to poison her and called in some neighbors, who guarded Hull to prevent him from disposing of poison which Mrs. Hull declared he had concealed in his pockets. When being taken to the station Hull attempted to throw away a bottle of arsenic, and a package of the same drug was found on his person when searched. He remained in jail until last week when he was placed on trail. He admitted that he attempted to poison his wife and was sentenced to six years in the penitentiary. The Hulls came originally from Toronto, Kan. Mr. Hull had a church in Evanston, Ill., a few years ago, and from there went to Massachusetts. They went to Minnesota six years ago, and for three years previous to his arrest Mr. Hull was pastor of the Clinton Avenue Methodist Church in West St. Paul.

HUNTERS FIGHT WILD DOGS.

Desperate Combat Takes Place in an Indiana Forest.

A large drove of wild dogs, even more ferocious than hungry timber wolves, has been discovered near the town of Morristown, Ind., and the people in that vicinity are greatly frightened as a result. It is probable that a grand hunt will soon be organized, in the hope of ridding the country of the dogs, which occupied a big cave, or den, in the Hamilton woods, a gloomy forest which has been avoided by human beings for many years past, on account of the belief that it is haunted.

The discovery that the woods shelter a drove of wild dogs was made by John W. Sullivan and his son Charles, Andrew Lamar and Matt Sullivan, while on a hunting trip. They tell a thrilling story of their encounter with the beasts, and Charles Sullivan is under the care of a surgeon, having been badly mangled by one of the animals.

The hunting party tracked the ferocious animals to their cave in a dense woods. While the party was debating the matter and laying plans to capture the animals there came a rush from the den and a dog, greatly resembling a rat terrier, only larger and with a bushy tail and a head something like that of a bulldog, darted past them with a snarl and darted in the tangled underbrush.

Lamar and Charles Sullivan immediately gave chase, while the rest of the party remained to guard the den and close the opening with brush and stones, so the animals inside could not escape. In a few minutes the report of a gun, some little distance away, was heard by those who remained at the den, followed by the howling of a dog and the screaming of Lamar and young Sullivan. It was found that the two had gotten quite close to the dog, when it had turned and attacked them. Then Lamar fired, severely wounding the beast. Just as the shot was fired another dog dashed into sight and made an attack upon young Sullivan. The boy was being badly bitten and scratched by the infuriated animal, but Lamar was afraid to shoot for fear of hitting Sullivan instead of the dog. Finally he saw a chance and fired, wounding the animal and driving it away. He was binding up Sullivan's wounds when half a dozen other dogs sprang from the brush and attacked them. When the rest of the party appeared upon the scene and fired a volley at the dogs the animals disappeared, after making a faint pretense of attacking the rescuing party. Where the dogs came from no one knows.

ATTACKED BY WILD DOGS.

The records of the Treasury Department show that from Feb. 1, 1896, to Nov. 1 there were coined at the mints of the United States 16,262,922 standard silver dollars. The seigniorage upon this amount was $5,051,430. The balance of the silver bullion purchased under the act of 1890 on hand Nov. 1, 1896, was 125,061,263 ounces, which cost the Government $112,865,625. The coinage value of this amount is $161,693,000.

Mrs. White is said to have collected over $300 from the saloonkeepers of Detroit within the last month. The State law makes saloonkeepers liable for selling liquor to a husband when forbidden to do so by his wife. One man gave her $5 cash and ten cords of wood in liquidation of the claim for $50 made by Mrs. White.

BRYAN'S CHILD IS ILL.

Oldest Daughter of the Silver Leader Sick with Diphtheria.

Ruth Bryan, the oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Bryan, who was taken down with diphtheria and the home at Lincoln, Neb., quarantined in consequence, is now much better. A message from the Bryan home says the little girl is mending steadily and no apprehension whatever was felt by her mother or attendants.

UNIQUE BRIDGE AT HASTINGS.

Believed to Be the Only One of Its Kind in the World.

Hastings' (Minn.) new wagon bridge has been completed, and it probably is the only one of the kind in the world. Its peculiar feature is the spiral approach at the south end. On account of the great height of the channel span of 380 feet—which is placed fifty-five feet above high-water mark—it was necessary to have a very long approach in order to avoid a steep grade. The town being so close to the river it would have been necessary to run a straight approach to such a distance as to spoil the looks of the business streets. In order to overcome this difficulty it was decided to make use of a corner lot 60x120 feet, adjoining the foot of Sibley street, and to build thereon a spiral approach.

Beginning at the heart of the city the approach starts with a rise of seven and three-fourths feet to the 100, forming an earth grade banked between massive retaining walls 120 feet long. The spiral, built of steel, begins at the end of this drive and winds its way with a curve of sixty feet, with a grade of five feet to the 100, for a distance of 385 feet; then striking again a straight approach from the point where the spiral ends, there is a rise of six feet to the 100 for a distance of 130 feet, to the beginning of the channel span. This span is 380 feet long from center to center of end pins.

Beyond is another 120-foot span; then twenty-one spans of thirty-three feet each, terminating with an approach of 172 feet, making a total of 970 feet. The largest span of 380 feet is built to carry 256 tons, besides its own weight, and the smaller span in proportion. The iron work of the north approach rests on well-constructed masonry pedestals, which have a concrete footing averaging nearly two feet thick and six feet square. Foundations of the large river pier, carrying 380 and 120 foot spans, were laid by means of a caisson, the river being at a very low stage. On the north side of the river all the masonry was placed on solid rock and the iron work tied to the rock by heavy anchor bolts. The joists which carry the oak floor and sidewalks are of first-class white pine; later they may be replaced by steel joists if desired. In the large span the entire floor is steel, except the planking which forms the surface.

In the surface there are 1,000 cubic yards of stone masonry, 20,000 feet of timber, 180 yards of concrete, 2,500 yards of cubic earth, 2,400 lineal feet of piling, 500 tons of steel and 150,000 feet of lumber for floors. Provisions for expansion on account of the change of the temperature is made at the main pier, the two spans being five inches longer in July than they are in January. The structure cost about $50,000.

The recent revival of the talk that Gen. Harrison will probably not protest against the use of his name in connection with the Senatorship led one of the ex-President's friends to say that, while he had no authority to speak for Gen. Harrison, he believed he knew the General's mind, and he desired to say that Gen. Harrison would not for one minute think of accepting an election as Senator.

Robert Huff, confined in the Jeffersonville Penitentiary from Lawrence County, to serve two years for manslaughter, made a desperate attempt to suicide by jumping from a second-story window headforemost. His injuries are fatal. Huff's rash deed was brought about by the disgrace of having to wear the convict garb. He resided at Bedford for many years, and was respected until his crime occurred.

The curfew ordinance put in force at Richmond about a week ago is working admirably and has resulted in freeing the streets of boys under 16 after 8 p. m. There has been but one arrest. There have been a number of inquiries from other places regarding the ordinance, and it is probable that several towns will follow the example of Richmond.

CHAPTER XII.

Mr. Timmons was taking the air on his own threshold late in the afternoon of that last Thursday in June. It was now some hours since the dwarf had called.

Although it had not yet struck six o'clock, he was thinking of closing his establishment. As he was about to retire for the long shutters that by night defended and veiled his treasure from predatory hands or prying eyes, his enormous left ear became aware that feet were approaching. He turned his pale blue eyes in the direction of the sound and saw coming along close to the wall the figure of a low-sized stout woman. She carried a fish basket in her hand. Out of this basket projected the tails of half a dozen red herrings.

"Good afternoon," said Timmons.

"Afternoon," said the woman entering the store without pausing. Then nodding her head back in the direction whence she had come she asked: "Any one?"

"No," answered Timmons. "Not a soul."

"I thought I'd never get here. It's mortal hot. I've brought you some fish for your tea."

"Herrings," he said, bending to examine the protruding tails. "Fresh herrings, or red?" he asked in a hushed, significant voice.

"Red," she whispered hoarsely, "and as fine as ever you saw. Are you going to have company at tea, Mr. Timmons?" asked the woman in a tone and manner of newly awakened interest.

"No; I am not expecting any one. I am going to have tea all by myself. I am very busy just now. I have had a visitor to-day—a few hours ago——"

"Well," whispered the woman, eagerly.

"And he'll do it!"

"He will. He's been to Milwaukee and has arranged all. They'll take every bit they can get and pay a good price—twice as much as could be got otherwise—from any one else."

"Fine! Fine! You know, Mr. Timmons, how hard it is to find a bit now, and to get so little for it as we have been handling is very bad—heart-breaking. It takes all the spirit out of Tom."

"How is Tom? Is he on the drink?"

"No, he isn't."

"That's a bad sign."

The woman rose and he handed her some money. Then followed a long, good-humored dialogue in which she begged for more, and he firmly, but playfully, refused her. Then she went away, and Mr. John Timmons was left once more alone.

He took up the basket, drew out the wooden skewer by which it was closed, caught the herrings in a bundle and threw them behind him on the gritty earthen floor. He opened the bag that lay beneath them and peered into it. Holding it in his left hand upon his upraised thigh he thrust his right hand into it and fumbled about, bending his head down to look the better. He was on the point of drawing something out when he suddenly paused and listened motionless.

"It's Stamer himself," cried Timmons, in a muffled voice. Then he added: "What does he want? More money? Anyway, I suppose I must let him in."

He turned round, caught up the scattered red herrings, thrust them into the bag, fixed it with the skewer, and then threw it carelessly on the hob of the old grate.

When the newcomer was inside the door and the bolt drawn once more, Timmons said, in a slow, angry tone, "Well, Stamer, what do you want? Is a bargain a bargain? You were not to come here in daylight, and only in the dark when something of great consequence brought you. I gave your wife all I will give just now, if we are to go on working on the co-operative principle. What do you want?"

The low-sized, round-shouldered man, dressed in fustian and wearing two gold rings on the little finger of his left hand, said in a whisper:

"You're going to see this cove to-night?"

"Yes."

"At what o'clock?"

"Midnight."

"Ah! It will be dark then!"

"What news you tell us. It generally is dark at midnight."

"Are you going to take much of the stuff with you—much of the red stuff—of the red herrings?"

Timmons drew back a pace with a start and looked at Stamer suspiciously.

"Have you come to save me the trouble, eh? Would you like to take it yourself? Eh? Did you come here to rob me? I mean to share fair. Do you want to throw up the great co-operative principle and bag all?"

Stamer's eyes winked quickly, and he answered in a tone of sorrow and reproach:

"You know I'm square. Tell me how much stuff you are going to take with you to-night?"

"About two pounds."

"I'm sorry, gov'nor, for bothering you. I'd give my life for you. Look here, gov'nor, suppose he is not an honest man, like me. He isn't in our co-operative plan, you know. Suppose he isn't particular about how he gets hold of a bit of stuff?"

"And tried to rob me?"

"That's not what I'd mind!" He put his hand to the back of his waistband. "You know what I carry here. Suppose he carries one, too?"

"You mean that he may murder me first and rob me after?"

Stamer nodded.

"Well, I'm very much obliged to you, Stamer, indeed I am; but I'm not a bit afraid, not a bit. Why, he's not much over four feet, and he's a hunchback as well."

He opened the door for Stamer, who, with a doubtful shake of the head, stepped over the raised threshold and went out. As Stamer sauntered down the street he muttered to himself, "I'll keep my eye on this affair anyway."

When the door was closed Timmons took up the fish basket, flung away the red herrings a second time and descended to the cellar.

CHAPTER XIII.

That same evening Dora and John Hanbury were sitting close to one another in the window place where Leigh and he had found her earlier. The long June day had faded into luminous night; the blinds had not been lowered, or the lamps in the room lit. The long, soft, cool, blue midsummer twilight was still and delicious for any people, but especially for lovers.

"Well, Dora," he began, "this has been an exciting day."

"Yes," she said, softly, and added, with tender anxiety, "I hope you have quite recovered? I hope you do not feel any bad effects of—of—what happened to you, Jack?" She did not know how he would take even this solicitous reference to his fainting.

"I feel quite well, dearest. Do not let us talk of that affair again."

"Tell me all," she said. "It was so good of you to bring him here. I felt quite proud of you when I saw you coming with him. Many men would have been afraid to trust so uncouth a man with so unpleasant a secret into this room of a Thursday."

"The fact is, Dora," said he in a tone of deliberation and dissatisfaction, "I did not bring him here of my own free will. Indeed, I do not know how you could imagine I would invite such a man. I found him contemplating a paragraph for the papers, and he promised he would say nothing about what had occurred if I would introduce him to you. He seems to have conceived a romantic interest in you, because of your likeness to some one he knows." Later this evening he should tell her all about this "some one."

"I see," she said, her spirits declining. It was not out of good nature or generosity, but cowardice, moral cowardice, Jack had brought Leigh. "Oh, Jack, I am so sorry!"

"Sorry! Sorry for what?" he cried.

She did not speak for a while. She was looking out into the dark blue air of the street. She had formed a high ideal of what he, her hero, ought to be, nearly was. But now and then, often, he did not reach the standard she had raised. She started without turning her eyes away from the blue duskness of the street, and in a tone of wonderful tenderness and sadness said:

"I don't know exactly what I was thinking of, Jack. The evening is so fresh and still it is not necessary for one to think. Angry with you, dear! Oh, no! Oh, no! Angry with you for what?"

"About the harsh words I said of Leigh. It seems to me your manner changed the moment I mentioned his name. Let us not speak of him any more this evening."

"But why should we not speak of him, Jack?"

"Because, dear, we are here together, and we are much more interesting to one another than he can be to either."

"Yes, dear, in a way more interesting to one another than all the world besides; but in another way not nearly so interesting as this poor clock maker," she said slowly, in a dreamy voice.

"Well," said he, withdrawing his arm from her waist and taking a chair opposite her in the window place. "I don't see what you are driving at."

"I cannot help thinking of the man and pitying him. He will go into his grave having missed nearly everything in the world."

"Why, the man has enough conceit to make a battalion happy. He is a greater man in his own opinion than the President."

"Many are not afflicted as he is. You say he is interested in me because I remind him of some one. How must it be with an ordinary human heart beating in such a body? Would it not be better for such a man to be born blind than to find his Pallas-Athena, as he calls her?"

The eyes of the girl could not be seen in the darkness of the room; they were full of tears and there were tears in her voice.

Hanbury started, he could not tell why. He exclaimed: "Good heavens, Dora! you do not mean to tell me that you feel seriously concerned in the love affairs, if there are such things, of this man?"

"Jack," she confessed, "I will not try to disguise it, I am intensely interested in this poor clockmaker, this mad visionary, if you prefer to call him that."

This was not at all the kind of preface Hanbury wanted to the communications he had to make to her. He felt disconcerted, clumsy, petulant. "I have been so unfortunate as to introduce the cause of all this anxiety to you. I would have been better for every sake if I had not gone back and met the man the second time, much better than to cut a ridiculous figure before all the town to-morrow!" He was growing angry as his speech went on. His own words were inflaming his mind by the implication of his wrongs.

She placed her hand gently on his, and said in reproachful voice, a voice quite different from the meditative tones in which she had been speaking, "Jack, I did not mean that. You know I did not mean that. Why do you reproach me with thoughts you ought to know I could not harbor?" She had turned in from the window, and was looking at him opposite her in the dim darkness. She was now fully alive to his presence and everything around her.

"No doubt," he said bitterly, "I am ungenerous to you. I am unjust."

"Jack, that is the most unjust thing you could possibly say to me. In saying it you seem to use words you fancy I would like to use, only I am not brave enough."

"I know you are brave enough for anything. I know it is I who am the coward."

"Jack! Oh, Jack!"

"You told me so yourself to-day. You cannot say I am putting that word into your mouth." He was taking fire.

"Have you no mercy for me, Jack?"

"You told me with your own lips I had no thought but of my miserable self in the miserable thing that happened."

"Jack, have you no pity?" She seized his hands with both her own.

"I brought that man here as the price of his silence, you—knowing the chicken-livered creature I am—absolutely asked him to come next week. To come here, where his presence is to cure me of my cowardice or accustom me to the peril of ridicule which you know I hate worse than death!" He was blazing now.

"Good night."

"After this, how can I be sure that you may not consider it salutary to betray me yourself?" He was mad.

"Good-bye, Jack. My heart is broken."

"I tell you——" He turned round. He was alone.

CHAPTER XIV.

John Hanbury hardly knew how he got home, his mind was so bewildered from his interview with Dora. He pulled himself together on learning from a servant that his mother wished to speak to him. A few minutes later he entered his room.

He led her gently to a chair and took one in front of her by the side of the dining table. He took her thin, white hand in both his own and looked into her calm, beautiful face, radiant with that tranquil light of maternal love justified and fulfilled.

"You have something to tell me, mother? Something pleasant, I hope, about yourself."

"I have, my son. It does not concern me, or if it does, but indirectly. Indeed, I do not know. It has to do with you, dear."

"With me, mother? And how?"

"I do not know exactly, John. Your father gave me in trust for you, as you know, a paper, which I was not to give to you except at some great crisis of your life. If no harm of any particular moment threatened you until you were thirty, you were never to see this paper."

"And you never read the paper?"

"No. Nor have I the least clew to its contents. I only know that your father was a sensible man, and attached great importance to it."

She handed him the paper of which she had spoken. He said good-night to her and entered his own room.

After John Hanbury had closed and locked the door of his own room he pulled down the blind, turned up the lights over the mantel, and standing with his back to the chimney piece, examined the packet in his hand.

It was a large envelope, tied in a very elaborate manner, and the string was sealed in three places at the back. On the front he read his own name in his father's well-known large legible writing. He cut the string and the envelope, and drew out of the letter a long narrow parcel. This he opened, and found to consist of half a dozen sheets of brief paper closely covered on both sides with the writing. He saw at a glance that the document took the form of a letter to him. It began, "My dear and only son, John," and finished with, "Your most affectionate and anxious father, William Hanbury."

At last he came to the final line, to his father's signature. He read all and then allowing the manuscript to fall from his hands and his arms to drop to his side, sat in the chair motionless, staring into vacancy.

For an hour he remained thus. Beyond the heaving of his chest and his calm, regular respiration, he was perfectly still. At length he sighed profoundly, not from sadness, but deep musing, shook himself, shuddered, looked round him as though he had just wakened from sleeping in a strange place. He rose slowly and going to the window drew up the blind. No lights were now to be seen in the rear of any of the houses, and complete silence filled the windless air.

"How peaceful," he whispered, "how calm. Gracedieu in Wisconsin? I seem to have heard of that place before, but I cannot recollect when or where."

Suddenly he struck his thigh with his clenched fist, calling out in a whisper: "Of course, I now remember where I heard of Gracedieu. What a stupid fool I have been not to recall it at once! It's the place that beautiful girl the dwarf introduced me to comes from! My head must be dull not to remember that! His Pallas-Athena, and I——"

He turned out the lights and began undressing in the dim twilight; there were already faint blue premonitions of dawn upon the blind.

"I wonder," he muttered in the twilight, "will his figures of time include Cophetua and the Beggar Maid! That old story I read this night was not unlike Cophetua and the Beggar Maid."

(To be continued.)

ONE WASHDAY A MONTH.

That's What Swedes Are Used to, and Our Mondays Appall Them.

Wash day has terrors for the Swedish servant girl. And no wonder, for in the land of the midnight sun wash day is almost as important as moving day is in this country. It never comes but once a month there, so the newly-arrived servant, remembering how much work it is to wash clothes in Sweden, is dismayed when she is told that every Monday is wash day. It even is asserted that rumors of this reach Sweden and keep girls from coming to this country. They cannot grasp the idea that stationary tubs, washing machines and wringers work miracles on wash day, says the New York Press.

It is a difficult and intricate undertaking to have your washing done in Sweden. That is why well-to-do people have wash day once a month and poor people rub out their clothes once a fortnight. Not that they wear soiled garments, though, for they change three or four times a week and store the dirty clothes in great chests, which are built into the attic for that purpose. At the end of each month the wash is brought down and sorted out according to quality and condition. Then the real struggle begins. Five or six women, professional washers, come in and begin to scour and rub. Each piece is put through this process in three separate waters. Then they pour boiling water on the white garments thirteen times in succession, and finally let them lie over night in a weak lye made by pouring water through a bag containing soap and wood ashes.

The next morning the tubs are placed on a sledge and drawn by a horse to the public washhouse. There the women take garment after garment and beat it with a paddle, holding it with one hand in a trough, through which flows a stream of water. The wash is then put back into the tubs and hauled home. Two men now come in to help, and the work of blueing and rinsing begins. A great tub, six or seven feet in diameter, is filled with indigo water; one man takes his place beside to turn the immense wringer, and the other stands ready to carry the tubs of clothes to the attic. Clothes rarely are dried in the open air in Sweden. Housewives are too tidy to run the risk of an extra speck of dust.

When the clothes have dried they are hauled away again to be ironed. The women who come in to do the washing usually are the wives of those who keep the ironing house, so that all the business is kept in the family. From the ironers the washing comes home as smooth as the cheek of a summer girl and so white it makes you think of a snowdrift, while its fragrance is like that of sweet spring flowers. It is a tedious and expensive process to get your clothes washed in Sweden, but when you receive them again they are free from the odor of fried ham or opium fumes so well known to the nose of the people here.

Beware of the man who tries to whitewash sin of any kind.

SOUTH POLE SHAKEN.

EARTHQUAKE BREAKS BERGS FROM ANTARCTIC ICE CAP.

Floating Ice in the Southern Sea Gives Information of the Convulsion of Nature—Is the Third Time the Event Has Been Recorded.

Big Bergs Afloat.

THE south pole has been shaken by an earthquake; under the vast stretches of ice which hold fast the antarctic regions there has been a mighty convulsion of nature, and the fact has been made known by the immense icebergs dislodged by the shock.

The strange messengers have brought their news slowly. Five years ago, according to the computations of the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, the earthquake took place. Since that time the southern sea has been filled with great bergs, slowly drifting northward into navigable waters, until at last their size and numbers have proved beyond doubt that their origin can be found only in some disturbance of the bed upon which the antarctic ice cap rests. The information has just been given out in the official statement prepared by the Hydrographic Office for the use of those who go down to the sea in ships.

This is the third and greatest of the recorded upheavals of the ice regions about the south pole. The first took place in 1832, the second in 1854, and the recent one, it is believed, in 1891. It has covered the southern sea with bergs greater than the city of Chicago and rendered navigation to the far south unsafe for years to come, for the bergs melt slowly. Large masses of ice have been met with before by vessels in the South Atlantic, but never in such great numbers.

Capt. Doan of the American ship Francis in February, 1893, when the number of bergs first began to increase noticeably, passed close to six icebergs, each several miles in length, and from 300 to 400 feet high, within twenty-four hours, and after a night of peril from floating ice found himself at daybreak confronted by an immense barrier of ice stretching as far as he could see from aloft. This was in latitude 51 degrees 1 minute south, longitude 49 degrees 15 minutes west.

In December of the same year the British bark Beechwood met with a monster berg in latitude 47 degrees 7 minutes south, longitude 41 degrees 44 minutes west. Officers of the Beechwood estimated that the mass of ice was twenty miles long and between 300 and 400 feet high. During the same month the captain of the Drumcraig sighted a berg twenty-five or thirty miles long and 300 feet high in latitude 49 degrees 34 minutes south, longitude 45 degrees 53 minutes west.

The average size of the bergs broken off by the recent earthquake is a thing hard to determine, for they are reported as varying greatly. The average, however, is greater than in the previous cases of 1832 and 1854. The immense size of the masses of ice dislodged by the shock will be appreciated when it is remembered that only about one-ninth of the berg appears above the surface of the water.

The occurrence of an earthquake alone is sufficient to account for icebergs of this size. There are other theories advanced to account for the dislodging of masses of ice from the ice cap, but all the features of the appearance of the icebergs in the South Atlantic, their number, size, shape and general nature go to prove the recent occurrence of an earthquake at the pole, by which the edge of the ice cap has been broken loose. The entire region in the neighborhood of the south pole appears to be covered by this ice mantle, without any inlet to its interior for the entrance of warm water to dissolve and break it up. The bergs from the antarctic continent do not begin to melt until they have drifted four hundred miles toward South America or Africa. So the force necessary to break pieces thirty miles long from the solid mass of the antarctic ice cap may be appreciated.

SOUTH POLAR ICE CAP IS BROKEN.

The New Female Prison at Joliet, Ill., Bears This Distinction.

The new Joliet, Ill., female penitentiary has been completed, and the women convicts transferred to their new quarters. The building is 50 by 100 feet, and three stories high. It is built of Joliet stone, most of which came from the penitentiary quarry. On each side of the entrance stand two large columns of masonry reaching to the top of the building, and the four corners of the structure are adorned with turrets. At the right of the first floor as one enters are the matron's parlor and sleeping apartments. On the left is the deputy warden's room. At the northeast corner of the building is the dining-room, connected with the kitchen on the third floor by a dumb waiter. This floor is also supplied with bathrooms. On the second floor, west side, is the hospital, a beautiful room for convalescents, and two rooms designed for isolated wards in cases of contagious diseases, which can also be used for sleeping apartments. On the third floor, east side, is the kitchen. On the west side, four solitary confinement cells, bathrooms, etc. On the first floor of the cellhouse are the chapel, knitting-rooms, ironing-room, laundry and dry-room, bathrooms, kitchen and the fanroom for heating and ventilating the building. The air in all departments is changed every fifteen minutes. Heat and electricity are conducted from the power-house of the prison proper in a conduit. A massive iron stairway leads to the second story, where there are 100 cells, arranged in two rows along each side of the spacious corridor, with a small gallery between the upper and lower tiers. Each cell is 7 by 8 by 10 feet, and is provided with a window, an exhaust flue, hot air duct, water, incandescent light, etc. The building is absolutely fireproof. The roof is so attached to the building that it can be raised if another story be needed. The building was begun last April, and 100 convicts have been working on it all summer, under the supervision of Warden Allen and his assistants. The total cost is within the appropriation, which was $75,000. Prison experts who have inspected it say it is the finest female prison in the world. There are sixty-eight female convicts, and Miss Madden, the matron, has made a good record.

SENATOR JOHN SHERMAN.

Man Who, According to Some Political Wiseacres, Is Slated for Secretary of State in McKinley's Cabinet.

A STORY OF GEN. WALLACE.

An Agent's Amusing Mistake in Confounding Burro with Bureau.

When Gen. Lew Wallace was serving as Territorial Governor of New Mexico a few years ago he shipped home to Indiana a carload of curios for his friends. The collection for the most part consisted of boxes of minerals, furs, Indian blankets and bead work, and with them was included a diminutive Mexican burro or donkey intended for a neighbor's child as a pet.

GEN. WALLACE.

When the car reached its destination the freight agent in checking up the contents of the car misunderstood the word "burro," and, thinking that it was the phonetic attempt of some illiterate railroader to spell "bureau," was unable to find any piece of furniture to fit the bill of lading. On the other hand, he found in the car a long-eared donkey, not included in the bill.

According to custom, whenever irregularities are discovered, he promptly telegraphed back to the shipping point: "Car No. 27,390, Albuquerque, consigned Wallace, arrived minus one bureau, plus one jackass. Please trace and notify." Gen. Wallace himself dictated the answer: "Change places with the jackass."

THE CYCLE SKATE.

Bicycle and Roller Skate the Latest Pneumatic Tire Locomotion.

The latest idea in pneumatic tire locomotion is a machine which the inventor calls the "cycle skate." The men responsible for the curious affair took for their model the safety bicycle and the ordinary roller skate, the result being a mongrel which, like all other inventions, is "going to revolutionize cycling." It consists of a steel frame, light but strong, which clamps on to the sole and heel of the shoe, and to this, directly beneath the heel and toe, are fastened two large wheels. They are made of either wood or steel, and are equipped with either solid rubber or small pneumatic tires. The skates, having only two wheels each, are even more difficult to manage than a bicycle, and an additional charm will be had in spinning over the highways and byways in that it will be a trick to master the cycle skate. The wheels are about three inches in diameter. The new invention is intended as much for the road as the rink. Of course, the cycle skate can be of little use except where the roads are hard and smooth. Asphalt, macadam or a well-rolled dirt road will serve the purpose admirably. The same exhilaration which skimming over the ice produces is felt when mounted on a pair of cycle skates.

CYCLE SKATING.

Animals and Earthquakes.

Inhabitants of lands subject to earthquakes believe that they can tell when a shock is going to happen by feeling unusually depressed and languid. But the effect of a coming quake is even more marked in animals. In Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, dogs, cats and jerboas get very restless. Just before the first shock in the Riviera in February, 1887, a groom noticed how fidgety his horses were, laying back their ears and declining to be calmed. Sea birds have been seen flying inland before a severe shock in Chili, while dogs have bolted in hot haste from a Mexican town, as if eager to escape from falling ruins and a too early grave.

ANCIENT COAT OF MAIL.

Once It Protected Scotch Warriors and Weighs Sixty Pounds.

Mr. A. B. Matthews, a well-known resident of Kansas City, Mo., is the proud possessor of a suit of mail that at one time served to protect a Scottish warrior from the arrows and sword thrusts of the enemies of his country or his clan. It had belonged to an old sea captain, and was several hundred years old, at least 400. The sea captain was one of the Douglas clan, and who knows but the coat had been present when the Douglas defied Marmion?

On a modern man of average build the coat hangs in folds, and the sleeves are six inches too long. The man on whom it had been a fair fit must have been considerably over six feet tall, and weighed in the neighborhood of 300 pounds. As an everyday garment it would prove somewhat embarrassing, as it weighs over 60 pounds.

HOW IT FITS A MODERN MAN.

He Was Dead Broke.

A mummy was dragged from the dust of the past; the centuries' fetters were broken at last. From the catacombs' depths he was hauled into view, when he fell to the ground and was cracked in two. In a moss-bedecked voice the sad mummy then spoke, and wailed slowly, sadly, "I fear I'm dead broke."—New York World.

The Crane.

The crane is considered to be the most cunning of all birds. It stations itself quietly by a pool, apparently absorbed in meditating, till it sees a fish to dart upon. So the word "crane" has become synonymous with hypocrite, traitor, etc., in the ancient and modern languages of India.

52 Years

Last evening, Nov. 30, marked the 52nd year of Dr. Ford's continuous residence in Auburn. He reached Auburn about sundown on that date, 1844 and since then there has not been a minute that Auburn was not his residence. We do not mean that he has never been out of town, for he has often taken trips to distant points, including hunting trips to Michigan and Minnesota, and visits with relatives, in the latter state, as well as extended visits with his daughter Mrs. D. S. Cochran and other friends in California. But this place alone has been his home, and as far as we know, the present residence on North Main street always been occupied by him. He is still a vigorous man for one of his years, and is one of the best known figures on our streets. We cannot wish him, as we might a younger person, that he may see 52 years more, but we do extend a hearty wish that all the years that may be allotted to him may be happy ones.

FAT FOLKS TURN SOMERSAULT

The Latest Cure for Obesity Set Forth by a London Paper.

Corpulence is a subject concerning which the average doctor has many questions to answer, says the New York World. Hardly a day passes without the query: "Oh, doctor, what shall I do? I am growing so stout."

In reply to the oft-repeated questions one says "Carlsbad," another "ride a wheel," while the third suggests some nauseous compound, or, perhaps, starvation. The latter process is always a sure means of reducing corpulency.

Day after day elaborate accounts of new treatments for obesity are detailed in both medical and lay journals. Some of these are not without their good points, while others are positively dangerous. At all events, the great majority of the "cures" require such an amount of persistence and self-denial that the cases in which they prove beneficial are not very numerous.

Massage and various movements, when performed in a systematic manner have always been highly rated in the treatment of obesity. Sweden (where massage and the movement cures originated) has been the home of the "cures" for many years.

The London Graphic is responsible for a report of the latest remedy for corpulency. The remedy, which is simplicity itself, requires in the main that the sufferer shall turn somersaults; how many and how often the Graphic's report does not say.

The principle may be a good one. To those, however, who contemplate an early trial of the remedy it may be well to point out an element of danger; that is appendicitis, in the production of which this new treatment may be an important factor. Several observers of repute have called the attention of medical men to the fact that people who indulge in gymnastic exercises, such as jumping, football, work upon the trapeze or bar are particularly liable to the disease mentioned.

May not one hope that as a result of this treatment uncommonly stout people of prominence will no longer be characterized as "fat"? It is well known that fat persons, men and women, are always eager to reduce their flesh. Fancy Mr. Cleveland, Mr. Reed, Gen. Harrison and other eminent persons being attracted by this newest and latest remedy for excessive embonpoint and putting it into practice.

FALSE START—ANOTHER RACE.

Feminine Fairness in Which the Carette Company Was Winner.

They were two pretty girls and they were evidently in high spirits when they entered an almost empty carette the other day. They carefully inspected the tubes which carry the fares along the sides of the vehicle to the box, then each one opened her purse.

"Tell you what," said the tall one, "let's race our nickel down and the one that loses pays for both."

"All right, let's," said the short one. "Got your nickel ready? Go."

"Mine's first," cried the tall one; "five cents, please."

"Why, look!" cried the short one, "we didn't start fair; the box is on your side!"

"Why, so it is," said the tall one; "funny we didn't notice that before. Let's try it over and you stand that much nearer the box."

Again they each put a nickel in and they dropped into the box simultaneously.

"Who has won, I'd like to know?" said the tall girl. By this time the driver, as well as one other passenger, was interested, and she spoke impartially to them all. But the driver turned suddenly to his horses and the other passenger looked out of the window with a queer noise in his throat.

"I'm sure I don't know who has won," said the short girl, snappishly, "but one thing I do know—we have each paid 10 cents for a ride down town."

And after the driver had been appealed to and assured them that he could not return the superfluous coins, they rode to their destination in silence.—Chicago Tribune.

"Mabel," he answered in a tone of patience sorely tried, "I'm ever so much obliged, but I don't think that is what I need But if you had a sedative that you could try on me I'd appreciate it more than tongue can tell."—Washington Star.

BIRTHPLACE OF STUART.

Not a Relic of the Painter or His Time Left.

Little respect is paid by Americans to the birthplaces of their illustrious dead, and the old snuffmill near Narragansett pier, in which Gilbert Stuart in 1755 first saw light, is no exception to the rule, says the Art Amateur. It may safely be said that it would seldom, if ever, be visited were it not a convenient objective point for a drive from the fashionable summer resort a few miles away. The route along the old Boston Neck road affords one of the most delightful excursions in Rhode Island. For awhile it holds in view to the right a picturesque estuary, beyond which on a fine day one sees the town of Newport. After a drive of nearly five miles we cross, at right angles, the dusty highway that leads past a little white church, down the breakneck hill to the Jamestown ferry; continue a couple of miles or so along a country road, which we leave to our left to follow a bridle path through the woods, at the end of which, hitherto hidden by a screen of tall saplings and a tangle of bracken, we come upon the object of our pilgrimage. Beyond the historical associations connected with it there is absolutely nothing in it to interest the vistor. The mill itself has long since fallen into decay. As to the house, the outside has undergone very little change, and its weather-stained shingles are pleasantly suggestive of the century and a half which in a new country like the United States is antiquity itself. But the threshold once crossed, one meets only with disappointment. Not a relic of the painter or his time! Tradition has not even provided a chair in which it might be supposed that the distinguished artist had sat.

THE LION'S ROAR.

A Great Physical Effort Is Necessary to Produce the Full Effect.

Dr. Livingstone noted the odd resemblance of the lion's roar to that of the ostrich, says the Spectator. Mr. Millais says that though the roar of the latter is not so loud, it has exactly the same tone as that of the lion. But the ostrich always roars his best, the lion very seldom. This is partly because a "good" roar needs a great physical effort. The whole interior and muscles of the mouth, throat, stomach and abdomen are, for the moment, converted into an organ of terrific sound and the sound does make the earth tremble—or appear to do so. But the attitude is not that usually drawn. Unless he roars lying down, when he puts his head up, like a dog barking, the lion "emits his first moan in any position, then draws in his neck and lowers his head with extended jaws, right down to his forepaws, as if about to be violently sick; while at the same time the back is arched and the whole animal bears an appearance of concentrated strain."

This is Capt. Millais' phonetic rendering of the sound, taken when listening to three lions roaring at their best: "Moan — roar — r-o-a-r — roar—roar—roar—grunt—grunt—grunt—grunt (dying away)."

Why lions roar, when it ought to pay better to keep silent, is not yet explained. General Hamilton was convinced that tigers hunting in company roar to confuse and frighten the deer. Possibly the lion roars, when prowling around a camp, in the hope of causing some of the draft animals to break loose; at other times it appears to be a form of conversation with others at a distance.

The Atmosphere.

Even if it were possible for man to live without breathing air he could not exist on the earth if it were without an atmosphere. Plants derive carbon, the most important element of their food, from the air, and without plants there could be no food for animals, and therefore no human beings. Water also comes from the atmosphere, but if there were no water there could be neither plants nor animals. If food and water could be supplied in some other way the world would still be unhabitable by plants and animals owing to the severity of the cold. Without an atmosphere there would be no winds and consequently no waves or ocean currents. The sea—if we may suppose one to have been supplied by some unknown cause—would be a stagnant pool, uninhabitable by seaweed or fish.

Mr. Bennett's Queer Memory.

James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, has a strange and erratic memory, according to the San Francisco Wave. One day, having bought a number of new shirts, he ordered them sent immediately to the office. The parcel duly arrived and remained there for over a year, Mr. Bennett, meantime, never putting in an appearance. Suddenly, without any notice, he rushed in one morning, evidently in a state of great pertubation. The staff concluded they were all to be discharged on the spot. Mr. Bennett excitedly asked: "Have those confounded fellows sent my shirts along?" He never even alluded to the lapse of time which had occurred since his last visit.

The Short Girl.

The short girl has everything on her side so far as the men are concerned; a man feels immediately at ease with a short girl, and to most men that is half the battle. The tall girl may be more imposing, but she cannot coax and pout, and flounce into pretty passions with the same execution as the short girl. No man likes to feel himself dwarfed by comparison with the girl he is fond of, and here again the small woman has a decided advantage. The short woman needs a protecting arm in a crowd, and she does not take up so much room in the street cars.

FUN IN THE WEST.

Thirteen Tally Marks on the Stock of His Gun.

The man who asked me for a match for his pipe seemed inclined to enter into conversation as he smoked, says a New York Herald writer, and knowing the freehanded ways of the west, I had little hesitancy in observing, after a bit:

"As you took off your cap I noticed that you had been scalped."

"Yes, I was skulped by Injuns a few years ago," he replied.

"Any story connected with it?"

"No, no. I met a dozen Injuns one day who wanted some fun, and so they throwed me down and skulped me."

"You are carrying some bad scars on your face?"

"Yes, purty bad. A grizzly b'ar made 'em with his claws. I was out huntin' one day and met a grizzly who wanted some fun, and he turned to and clawed me."

"He didn't lame you in the left leg at the same time?" I asked.

"Noap. He didn't hev nuthin' to do with my leg. I was down to Golden City one day and met Joe Lee. Joe wanted some fun and so he pulled down on me and shot me in the hip."

"I see you have a finger off the left hand. Was that lost while somebody was having fun with you?"

"Wall, yes. I was takin' a drink at a bar in Big Bend and forgot to invite the crowd to walk up. The boys thought they'd have some fun with me, so one of 'em swiped off that finger to make me lose my drink."

"Did a bullet split your right ear?"

"Yes, that was a bullet. A feller named Tom White did that. Met him one day when he was lookin' fur fun, and he split that ear with hot lead."

"This western country is a great place for fun, I take?" I said after a period of silence.

"You bet!" he heartily replied.

"And you must have had your share?"

"I calkerlate! Count 'em!"

And he handed me a gun, and I counted thirteen tally marks on the stock. They don't tally for anything less than human beings out west.

ATE A BARREL OF EGGS A DAY

Shipwrecked Men Subsisted on Them Solely for Twelve Days.

"Do you like eggs?" was the question that stirred up a "'49-er" to make some talk in a Bangor store the other day. He was an old man and he straightened up to something like the height of his prime as he answered. "I had a surfeit of them once. 'Twas toward fifty years when I was on the way home from California. We left the isthmus on a good brig bound for New York, but ran into a coral reef in the Caribbean sea and were wrecked. It was a patch of sand just out of the water, but you ought to see the flocks of sea fowl that nestled on it! They had to move out of the way to give us room to stay there, and that was about all they would do. Their nests were everywhere, and there were eggs in abundance. We ate about a barrel of them every day during the twelve days we were there. Some of us got off in a boat and went to San Juan, in Nicaragua, where we got a vessel to go after those we left on the reef. That vessel was commanded by William Lawrence, of Bath, who was killed by a man named Wilkinson while he was a policeman there. He tried to get to the reef, but bad weather stove us up so we had to set in for New Orleans, where we found the rest of the men rescued by another vessel. But eggs"—the old man's face took on a peculiar expression.—Lewiston Journal.

BLIND TOM.

Beautiful Musical Soul in a Repulsive Body.

In the spring of 1891 he came to Oxford, Miss. I was then teaching in the university, and Blind Tom and his manager—Mrs. Bethune, I suppose it was—had their quarters at the same hotel at which I was boarding, says the New York Post. I thus had the opportunity of making several discoveries in regard to him. One was that he was not totally blind. When Andy, the hotel waiter, would bring Tom's meals to his room Tom would bend over the plate and scan it eagerly and was sure to let himself be heard from if anything he wanted was not there. And I tested Tom in his room and found he could tell where I was sitting. Another discovery was that he was not altogether the idiot I had heard he was. After his musical exhibition was over I went up to talk to him in company with our professor of physics, who wanted to see whether Tom's memory for sounds was retentive for other than musical sounds. So I repeated to Tom the imperfect active of a Greek verb. To our surprise Tom looked at me and said, somewhat stammeringly, "Th-that's Greek." We were informed that he could tell many of the modern languages in the same way. And in his room at the hotel he repeated the whole of the Lord's prayer in Greek with perfect accuracy. As I watched this great, hulking fellow with thick hands and stumpy fingers and thought of his power to make the piano boom like a cannon or roar like an express train or imitate the gentlest notes that the tenderest touch could evoke the incongruous union of his musical soul and his repulsive looking body suggested the idea of the delicate mechanism to a wonderful musical instrument incased in a rough board box rudely knocked together by a clumsy carpenter with a dull hatchet; and I could not help remembering in what ugly case the same maker had inclosed the beautiful and sublime soul of Socrates.

GOLD BUGS.

Beetles That Are Worth $50 Apiece—Rothschild's Fine Collection.

Apropos to the term gold bug, the most remarkable gold bugs in the world are found in Central America, says the Buffalo Commercial. They belong to the genus plusiotis and one might easily imagine a specimen to be the work of some clever artificer in metal. The head and wing cases are brilliantly polished with a luster of gold itself. To sight and to touch they have all the seeming of metal and it is hard to realize that the creature is a mere animal. Oddly enough, there is another species of plusiotis from the same region, which has the appearance of being wrought in solid silver, freshly burnished. These gold and silver beetles have a market value. They are worth from $25 to $50 each. The finest collection of them in existence to-day is owned by Walter Rothschild of the English banking firm. Though a young man, only 25 years of age, he has already spent $200,000 on beetles. Every year he sends two men to Central America to gather beetles. One of the most beautiful bugs in the world is a small beetle known to science as the "blue hoplia." Its back is an exquisite iridescent sky-blue and the under part of its body is of a bright silver hue. The notion that it contains silver is widely entertained, and attempts have frequently been made to extract silver from it.

—A Nebraska cyclone blew the hair off a bald-headed man in Texas, killed an honest lawyer in Illinois, took the wind out of a prohibition orator in Maine and knocked the socks off a bare-footed Coxeyite in Washington, knocked a hole in the cheek of a man who after taking a paper four years, sent a note to the editor saying he never subscribed for it, but when it struck this political gust that started over in Ohio and which has given us somewhat of a quite, reflective and disgusted appearance—we on the democratic side—it got ashamed of itself, went off and took down its sign. It wasn't to be compared to this other in knocking out force.

—The republicans of Waterloo are about all of them after the postoffice at that place. They have some pretty good timber too and postmaster Getts will have no trouble in getting the place filled when he leaves it.

—It takes gall for the Chicago Chronicle, gold democrat, to put in so much time abusing McKinley whom it and its friends helped to elect, and to find fault with republican doctrines that it has helped to make possible realities. The Chronicle should buy a suit of sackcloth and go into retirement, or else go boldly into the republican camp and stay there.

—Two bright little lads were callers at this office to-day. They were A. G. and J. H. Bonnell, sons of J. P. Bonnell, formerly in charge of the schools of St. Joe, but at present teaching the High School in Waterloo. The boys are working their way into the "craft" themselves, having a little printing outfit, which they use at odd times when school does not interfere.

—Born to Mr. and Mrs. B. C. Robbins, North Main street this morning at 8, a son. All doing well. If Bert had been a poet, something like this would have come over the wire:

Now Grandma C. and Papa B.
And Mamma H. are glad;
For though he looks like Mamma;
He's the image of his dad.

—August Bartles of the County Home made us a little visit to-day, One can gain a good deal of information from a chat with him, but nothing surprised us more than his statement of the amount of food those 31 people people use in one week. Think of making 100 loaves of bread on Tuesday and 100 more on Friday. And other things in proportion. Mr. and Mrs. Bartels have made their work there a great success.

In 1892 Mr. A. L. Goldwater, who own a three retail drug stores in New York City, having learned of the great value of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for colds, croup and whooping cough, ordered a supply for his customers. It met with so much favor that he soon found it necessary to order more, and during the winter sold over two gross of the remedy. He says it gives the best satisfaction of any cough cure he has ever handled. For sale at 25 and 50 cts. per bottle by Davenport the Druggist. 52

—Besides the dispute over the Alaskan bonudary line, this country and Great Britain have another little dispute of their own without going to Venezuela. In the Rainy Lake River and outlet of Rainy Lake is a little island known as Hunters' Island. So far we have not been able to ascertain whether the main channel of the stream is on the Minnesota side of the island or on the Manitoba side. When both nations do find out for certain they will know whether Hunters' Island belongs to us or to Canada.

When most needed it is not unusual for the family physician to be away from home. Such was the experience of Mr J. Y. Schenck, editor of the Caddo, Ind. Ter., Banner, when his little girl, two years of age was threatened with a severe attack of croup He says: "My wife insisted that I go for the doctor, but as our family physician was out of town I purchased a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, which relieved her immediately. I will not be without it in the future." 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by, Davenport, the druggist. 52

—Bill Nye says: "Go where you will in this country to-day and you will find men talking about silver, tariff, and raw material, who haven't had a mouthful of raw material or any other kind in their house for weeks except as their wives earned it and brought it home to them. The country it full of men who have thought so hard for the commonweal that the seats of their trousers shine like the dome on the Massachusetts state house."

—A cook in a St. Louis restaurant found a five dollar gold piece in the gizzard of a wild goose, and saved it up. Then he invested the $5 in lottery tickets, and one of these drew him a prize of $3,750. Who says McKinley did not do it? He doubtless left that gold piece right where that wild goose would see, and later on made a quiet arrangement with the lottery folks.

H should make a strong and clear declaration in favor of Cuba, looking not merely to a recognition of belligerent rights, a thing that would do no service, but a plain recognition of her independence. The interests of humanity demand that Spanish atrocities in the Island, should cease.

—Jack and Willie Cuppy are hustling young lads. Last evening they were out with each a basket of fresh pop corn, salt and buttered just to suit and for 5 cents two packages could be purchased. This is a very honorable way for boys to earn their Christmas money. The boys are as courteous and polite as sales people of mature years.

Todd, Wakemon, Ohio, and Mrs. Virginia C Meredith, of Columbia City. Also many of DeKalb counties most prominent workers will be present and take part in the work. A cordial invitation is extended to everybody to attend this institute.

R. M. LOCKHART
Chairman.

Early Settler.

Since writing yesterday of Dr. Ford, we met Eli Miers who lives west of of town on the old T. C. Elson farm, which he now owns. He first came to Auburn, Oct. 3, 1842, coming here with Henry Clay, in whose family Mr. Miers was reared. They settled on the old Grogg farm in Richland township. It may interest some of our older people to learn that Mr. Clay didd about six weeks ago at his home in Elkhart, at a ripe old age. His two daughters, Mrs. Ellen Lesh, of Goshen, and Mrs. Belinda Hess, of Springfield, Ill., were here this week to visit Mr. Miers, who is their uncle.

Andrew Allison.

Hon. Andrew Ellison died at his home in Lagrange on Monday, Nov. 30, and was buried Thursday, Dec. 3. He was one of the wealthiest men of his county and well known all over this part of the state. He was for some years quite prominent in politics, and in 1870 ran for congress on the democratic ticket. But as Gen. Hascall ran on the same ticket, and the party was in the minority anyhow, the late Billy Williams, of Warsaw, easily won the place.

TOPICS OF TIMES

The sixty-eight patrons of the Clinton, Mo., new telephone exchange are within talking range of eighty-four different towns.

Baltimore has a flourishing Canary Bird Breeders' Association, and it is about to hold an exhibition of songsters raised by its members from stock imported from Andreasburg. The society now numbers fourteen members.

Some bogus bids were found among those just made for the $16,000,000 and odd New York city bonds. One man who was a heavy bidder at high prices was found to occupy a hall bedroom at $1.50 a week, and his landlady said that he was out of work and behind in his rent.

The taxable wealth of the negro population in the United States is over $300,000,000. There are 23,462 negro church bodies, with church property valued at over $26,626,448. There are over 1,000 college trained ministers and 2,677,977 church communicants. The census shows that there are nearly 4,000,000 communicants.

Daniel Evans, of Marion, O., and Patrick Shahey, of Pittsburg, Pa., have been sentenced to the Ohio penitentiary for ten years for robbing Farmer Daniel Lloyd of $400 about ten days ago. Anna Gleason wanted to marry Evans before he went away, but the judge thinking that he could not very well take the vow to "support, protect and love," sent him away on the early train.

The most "electric" village in Europe is Borobeke, in Belgium, where a plant has been put in operation according to plans drawn by Professor Schoentges, of Ghent. All streets, alleys, and private roads, all public and private buildings are lighted by electricity. The great dairy works of the village are worked by electricity. For all this each householder pays only 19 francs ($3.80) per year.

James Thorton, a voodoo doctor, has died at Pittsburg of laughing. His laugh was infectious. Sometimes he would start to laugh, and it was only with great difficulty that he could stop. These spells weakened him. The other day he had a severe attack of laughter. When he reached home he went to bed, where he had another laugh. Then he fell asleep. Next morning he was found dead.

The Sheats laws of Florida, that made the teaching of mixed classes of white and colored pupils an offense punishable by imprisonment, have been declared unconstitutional and void. Last spring teachers in the school of the American Missionary Society at Orange Park were arrested for violation of this law. This case was carried before the Supreme Court of Florida, and brought about the recent declaration.

Joe Housel and Sam Hall are a pair of cripples who reside at Lebanon, Smith County, Kan. They became very much excited over the election, and Housel bet his cork leg against Hall's crutches that Bryan would win. When the issue was determined Housel took off his leg and sent it to Hall. It didn't fit the latter, so he nailed it to his gate post and put a placard on it which read: "The step-and-go-fetch-it son of a gun may know better next time."

Brooklyn has a new idea in the educational line. It is proposed that a "parents'-day" shall be established in the public schools, when fathers, mothers and instructors shall meet in the school buildings to discuss things of moment anent the teaching of the young hopefuls. As the main importance of the new day is to compel an interest by the public in its own affairs, and not to trust too largely to its agents, the idea is a good one, and should not be confined to the city of churches.

The Japan Mail has an article on Japanese officials, in which it asserts that they are less corrupt than any other in the world. There may be exceptions, but these are astonishingly few. In strict attention to duty the Japanese officials of all ranks, it seems, rival the Prussians, but while the latter are somewhat stiff and overbearing in manner, the Japanese is also polite. If a Japanese official is not polite it is always the fault of some foreigner who, because he happens to have enough money to go globe trotting, acts as if the whole earth belonged to him.

A new use for rubber dolls with whistles concealed about their persons has been discovered in Louisville. In that city a burglar entered a house, filled a basket with silverware and other portable objects of value and was about to depart in safety and wealth when in the darkness he stepped on one of the toys mentioned which had been left on the floor by the little girl to whom it belonged. The doll, thus maltreated, gave one long shriek of agony. The burglar dropped the basket in alarm. Large male members of the family awoke on all sides and the would-be depredator fled empty handed.

Declines Transactions with a Ghost.

A young gentleman who lately left his father's house, having exhausted his credit, telegraphed the other day to his parents:

"Your son Walter was killed this morning by a falling chimney. What shall we do with the remains?"

In reply a check was sent for £20, with the request: "Bury them."

The young man pocketed the money and had an elaborate spree. When in condition for writing he sent his father the following note:

"I have just learned that an infamous scoundrel named Barker sent you a fictitious account of my death and swindled you out of £20. He also borrowed £10 from me and left the country. I write to inform you that I am still alive and long to see the parental roof again. I am in somewhat reduced circumstances, the accumulations of the last five years being lost—a disastrous stock speculation—and if you would only spare me £10 I would be very thankful for your favor. Give my love to all."

A few days later the cunning youth received the following dignified letter from his outraged parent:

"My Dear Son—I have buried you once and that is the end of it. I decline to have any transactions with a ghost. Yours in the flesh, Father."—Scraps.

Sudden Conflagration.

On their long voyage of exploration down one of the great Colorado canyons, Colonel Powell and his companions arrived late one afternoon at the mouth of a little creek, in an alcove filled with luxuriant vegetation. Here they made camp, with a group of cedars on one side and a dense mass of box-elders and dead willows on the other. Colonel Powell had gone off to explore the alcove, and then came a catastrophe, which he thus portrays in his journal:

While I was away a whirlwind came and scattered the fire among the dead willows and the cedar spray, and soon there was a conflagration. The men rushed for the boats, leaving all they could not seize at the moment, and even then they had their clothing burned and hair singed, and Bradley had his ears scorched.

The cook filled his arms with the mess-kit, and jumping into a boat, stumbled and fell, and away went our cooking utensils into the river. Our plates were gone, our spoons were gone, our knives and forks were gone. "Water catch 'em; h-e-a-p catch 'em."

Once in the boats, the men were compelled to cut loose, as the flames, running out on the overhanging willows, were scorching them. Loose on the stream, they must go down, for the water was too swift to make headway against it. Just below was a rapid filled with rocks. On they shoot, no channel explored, no signal to guide them!

At this juncture I chanced to see them, but had not yet discovered the fire, and their strange movements filled me with astonishment. Down the rocks I clambered, and ran to the bank. By the time I arrived they had landed, and we went back to the late camp to see if anything left behind could be saved.

Some of the bedding and clothing was found, also a few tin cups, basins and a camp kettle. And this was all the mess-kit we now had; yet we did just as well as ever.

Old Coaching Days.

The old coaching days, as far as convenience for travel was concerned were the dawn of the great days of our present rapid means of communication. The seventy years or so in which mail coaches waxed and flourished, and finally died out before the incursion of railways and steam engines, have a decided flavor of romance attached to them, and no doubt the coming and going of stage coaches lent a certain amount of color and interest and life to the country places and towns through which ran the great main coaching roads. The Bath road, the Dover road, the York road, were highways of communication along which rolled the heavy private coaches and chariots of the country magnates and the stage coaches with their steaming horses, passing the various stopping places with the regularity of clockwork.

These stage coaches, with their complement of coachmen and guards, affording endless subjects of interest and illustration to the artist and literary men of the day. Imagine Charles Dickens without stage coaches, and denuded of all his vivid descriptions of the scenes such as those in the yard of the White Hart Inn, High Street, Borough, in "Pickwick," or of the mail coach on the Dover road in "A Tale of Two Cities." It is difficult for the present generation to realize the fatigue and the wintry cold of such long journeys, when frozen feet were enveloped in a little straw, and a "shawl" folded round the neck was thought to be a fit protection against the keen night air, a strong contrast to the luxurious cushioned carriages, hot-water tins, and the fur-lined rugs and great coats of the present day.—Spectator.

Neighbors Onl .

A car was going through the La Salle street tunnel, says the Chicago Tribune, when the conductor began to collect the fares. About half-way down the car sat a prim, elderly woman. Beside her was a curly headed boy, with a mischievous expression in his blue eyes. The woman paid her fare. The conductor hesitated.

"That boy's over age, madam!" he said.

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"He's over 5 years old."

"Why, I guess he is," she said, turning around and looking at him. The boy laughed.

"And he takes up a seat the same as bigger folks," the conductor went on.

"So he does," replied the lady.

"Madam, you'll have to pay his fare."

"I don't see why," indignantly.

"He's your boy, and——"

The small boy could no longer restrain himself.

"I don't belong to her," he said, laughing; and he gave the conductor his nickel, but the woman somehow didn't seem to enjoy the mistake.

May Be Good for Another Century.

A gentleman from London visiting Scotland, having heard that a man residing in the district where he had put up had just completed the 100th year of his age, and being anxious to see the centenarian, paid him a visit. In the course of conversation the cockney congratulated the old man on the healthy appearance he had at this time of life, "but," says he, "I presume you do not expect to see the end of another hundred years?" "I'm noo very sure about that. You must mind I'm a heap stronger the noo thin whin I started wi' the first hunner," was the old man's reply.—Tit-Bits.

A Good Sign.

"But, Bertha, it was only last month that I paid a dressmaker's bill of £50 and here is another one for this month of £40."

"Well, dear Edgar, you see that shows that I am beginning to spend less."—London Tit-Bits.

Hubby—How do you suppose the saying "There is nothing new under the sun" ever originated?

HANNA'S EXPENSES.

ENORMOUS AMOUNT EXPENDED TO ELECT M'KINLEY.

Sum Placed Nearly Five Millions—Republicans Will Continue the Campaign for Maintenance of the Gold Standard and Enslavement of Toilers

Have Money Left.

The New York World publishes a story in which it places the fund handled by Republicans in the recent campaign at only $1,462,000. Though those in a position to know agree that $5,000,000 would be closer to the real amount. According to the World's story, for the first time in twenty years the Republican national committee completed its work, paid all its debts and had a surplus. Money flowed into the Republican coffers. From the East the big contributions in round numbers were as follows:

New York	$500,000
Philadelphia	475,000
Pittsburg	250,000
Boston	162,000
Scattering	75,000
Total	$1,462,000

The Philadelphia contributions include subscriptions from Bethlehem, Harrisburg, Mauch Chunk and other towns. The Boston subscriptions include many New England cities. Chicago contributions were disbursed chiefly in that city and State, and only a small part passed through the national committee treasury.

Within the past week about all the accounts of the national committee have been settled, and Treasurer Cornelius N. Bliss finds himself in possession of a surplus. It is hard to find out just how much money Messrs. Hanna and Bliss have on hand. Neither will tell, but Mr. Bliss denied a couple of days ago that it was about $100,000. A well-known Republican leader, who has been close to the national committee during the campaign, told a World reporter that the balance on hand after all expenses were paid would be between $75,000 and $90,000. This will be used to carry on the permanent organization and to prepare for the battle of 1900. "No national committee," he said, "ever had such an enormous financial resources at its disposal." The dissemination of literature was the heaviest item of expense. This was practically all done through the Chicago Bureau presided over by Perry Heath. Through this bureau there was sent out in one of the biggest weeks of the campaign 3,000,000 documents by mail, each piece covered with a 2-cent stamp. This meant an expenditure of $60,000 for postage stamps alone. These are large figures.

Mr. Hanna has at last told how he "done it," and we are so glad. Most any old manager will know what is needed in the next campaign and will be happy in the thought that the amount of it is so small. He confesses that it took fully $1,400,000 to elect McKinley, including $60,000 a week for postage. It makes the public pulse beat with a quickened thump and the public face light up with a glow of pride to be thus taken into the Great Man's confidence. But, not satisfied with a general statement, the Republican chairman goes further and points out the sources of his revenue, saying where the big contributions were made.

It will be noticed that Cleveland, Mr. Hanna's home, is not in the list, which may lead some to declare that the Great Organizer was rather too well known among his neighbors to canvass them for subscriptions successfully. A most gratifying feature of the whole thing is the reflection that Republican spellbinders in this year of grace, 1896, performed a labor of love. None of them were paid for their services. Schurz, Cockran, Reed, Thurston and all that outfit not only worked for nothing but found themselves, so to speak. Of course, they were entitled at least to their railroad fare, but the Republican campaign committee was so poor it couldn't afford the outlay, and they had to either buy tickets or walk.

Of course, Mr. Hanna doesn't say this, but his figures do, and, unlike Mr. Hanna, figures cannot lie. To examine them: The active work of the Republican committee began the first week in July and ended Nov. 3—covering a period of about eighteen weeks, during which $60,000 per week was spent for postage. This would make Uncle Sam's tariff on the work of education $1,080,000, leaving $320,000 for Perry Heath's salary and other expenditures.

Now, $1,080,000 worth of postage stamps would distribute in eighteen weeks 3,375,000 pounds of literature, and we are quite sure that it cost at least 5 cents a pound to print, fold and distribute even such light, airy and useless stuff as was sent out by Mr. Hanna's committee, which would leave a margin of only $151,250, with Mr. Heath's salary still unprovided for. Deduct $1,250 for gas bills, $5,000 for Terry Powderly and $45,000 for the New York office, then there is $100,000 left for distribution among 10,000 McKinley clubs throughout the country. This balances the sheet and leaves the Canton excursionists in the dark as to who provided "them tickets," "those beers" and that badge.

Let the Work Go On.

The defeat of John C. Fremont for President in 1856 did not stop the anti-slavery discussion. It went on with increasing vigor, and in 1860 as a result Abraham Lincoln was elected President. The campaign of 1856 was the first direct struggle with the slave power, then as firmly intrenched in the control of the Federal Government as the money power is to-day. The first contest resulted in defeat. The second brought victory.

The silver fight is very similar to that which was waged against slavery. The declarations of the Chicago platform of 1896 were almost as new as were the declarations of the Republican platform of 1856. Both of them caused a new alignment of parties. The new Democracy with the silver banner has gone down in defeat in its first campaign. So did the Republican party with its anti-slavery banner. The few weeks devoted to the campaign of education, were not sufficient to convince the people of the real purposes of the slave power. But the discussion went on, and Buchanan's administration was an object lesson. So the silver discussion will go on, and so McKinley's administration will be an object lesson. Before his time is half expired people will recall the assertions and predictions of the silver orators and the silver press in 1896, and wish they had voted for Bryan. Firmly they will resolve to vote the silver ticket in 1900. By that time the iron hand of the money power will have been making itself more generally felt, and it will not be incased in a glove, either. Nor will the people have to be told of its purposes. They will see them plainly enough and eagerly await the opportunity to get to the ballot box. The result in 1900 will be a silver victory and place the powers of the Federal Government in the hands of those favorable to the restoration of silver to the coinage.

While the presidential campaign has gone against the free coinage forces, there is hope in the fact that the number of silver Congressmen has been largely increased. With this fact as an incentive, the campaign of silver education should be vigorously continued. The American people are both intelligent and patriotic. They have not had time, however, to be educated on this issue. Great and influential forces have been arrayed against the cause of bimetallism and these have won in the interest of the single gold standard. In four years their eyes will have been opened and the restoration of silver will be accomplished.—Denver News.

Has Only Begun.

"The fight has just commenced," says Mr. Bryan. "If the Republican party," says Mr. Moreton Frewen, "warned by the narrowness of its victory, will work for currency reform, good results may be near." John Sherman expresses the hope that "the present gold standard will be maintained." Chairman Jones believes that McKinley will be compelled to "bend all his efforts toward securing an international agreement." The English Bimetallic League thinks the Republicans will have to work for international bimetallism.

These expressions give some idea of the manner in which the election of McKinley has been received. If they indicate any one thing with certainty, it is that the silver question is as far from settlement as it was on the morning of Tuesday, Nov. 3. They mean that the new administration must face the same discussion that Harrison and Cleveland have faced.

If Mr. McKinley is true to his party platform, there are two things that he must do—maintain the present treasury rulings which have fastened a gold standard on the country in defiance of law, and promote an international conference. There are a large number of persons who favor the restoration of silver, but who honestly believe that it can only be accomplished by means of an international agreement. This class of bimetallists will now have an opportunity of testing the accuracy of their belief, and of doing what they can to secure favorable action on the part of the new administration to this end. They will probably find that all this talk about international bimetallism is a sham and a fraud, and intended merely to divide the people and cover up the real purpose of the money power to fasten the single gold standard on all of the commercial nations of the earth. Finding this out, these international bimetallists will have one of two courses to take—join the gold standard forces, or fall back with the real silver party, which assumes that there is but one way of securing international bimetallism, and that is by restoring silver in this country and thereby compelling other nations to do the same.

"The fight has just begun." This is the real feeling of the millions who cast their ballots for Bryan. They do not propose to cease fighting until they have won. Their cause is just. It is the cause of civilization and of humanity, and will be fought to a finish. Whether the restoration of silver comes through an international agreement, or whether it comes by a vote of the people of the United States and without awaiting or asking the consent of any other nation, come it will, and the gold power may as well so understand it.

Let Democrats Unite.

Because some hot-headed and indiscreet persons, who committed themselves against the Democratic cause at the recent election, have since met and resolved that they never, never will act with the noble old Democratic party again, there is no reason for being discouraged. Nobody wishes to force companionship where it would be unwelcome.

But there are others. The great mass of the Democratic party is not sold to McKinley, expects no favors from him and would accept none if offered. Nor is it endeavoring to effect its own defeat. Nine-tenths of the Democratic vote which has been estranged from us this year intends and proposes to return whenever it can do so consistently with its own views and convictions. We might go further still and say that nine-tenths of that vote has accomplished all that it cared for, and is ready to act with us now.

In Congress and out of Congress we are entering upon a four years' campaign against an administration, the acts of which will challenge vehement opposition from the start. We need the aid and support of every man of true Democratic principles and purposes. While we can afford to lose those who will not be reconciled, and who expect to find elsewhere more congenial partisan associations and rewards, we desire to welcome the support of every man who believes that ours should be a government, not of bankers or of trusts, but of the people.—New York News.

Anderson, Ind., Nov. 13.—The American Plate Glass Works at Alexandria were put in full operation this morning, with 400 men at work. The plant has been closed two years. President Doxey says work will be steady.—Chicago Times-Herald, Nov. 13, third page, second column.

Anderson, Ind., Nov. 12.—Associated charities have been organized this week in all of the gas belt cities. The organization in this city was effected to-day. Investigation discloses that there will be more suffering in the gas belt this winter than in any previous one, not excepting 1893, when thousands were kept by charitable organizations. It is thought that between 3,000 and 4,000 men, women and children in this city will have to be cared for. Many cases are distressing.—Chicago Times-Herald, Nov. 13, third page, second column.

Brief Comment.

Dryden must have had his prophetic eye on the goldbug press when he wrote:

The only free silver which plutocrats favor is the silver plate that is free from taxation.

It is to be hoped that the eleven newspaper men in the next Congress will 'leven the whole lump.

About six months ago Bill Chandler was caught in his folding tongue and lost all chance to get "next" with the McKinley administration.

An hideous figure of their foes they drew,
Nor lines, nor looks, nor shades, nor colors drew,
And this grotesque design exposed to public view.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, whose editor once said that the best way to deal with strikers was to shoot them, now declares that the masses and classes in this country work harmoniously together, and are unable to tell where the division line is located.

THE FIGHT HAS ONLY BEGUN.

Mark—Great Heavens! Mack, that was merely a skirmish the other day. Those fellows have come to stay.

BABY PROPHET.

Mabel Miller, Though Only Five Years Old, Tells of Future Happenings.

Several stories about Mabel Miller, a little 5-year-old Chicago girl with a strange gift of seeing into the future, have appeared in the newspapers. Her like is not to be found in all history. Little Mabel's home in on Houston avenue, near the corner of 90th street, in the south end of Chicago—a snug little house whose second-story windows are on a level with the sidewalk, so far down in a grassy hollow is it sunk, but it is a pleasant home for all that.

From her earliest infant days, in fact, since she learned to talk distinctly, Mabel Miller has been in the habit of foretelling coming events in such a simple and natural way that no one took her words seriously. Indeed, her announcements in regard to things that were going to happen were considered as mere baby's prattle—amusing without meaning. But when Mabel was 2 years old it suddenly dawned upon her mother that whatever the child foretold came true, as sure as fate. Mrs. Miller then began to take notes and watch her little girl closely.

Often Mabel would remark something like this: "Mamma, hurry and get your work done. Aunt Anna is coming this afternoon." And the aunt arrived; or when she announced: "Grandma is coming to-morrow; and I am going home with her," her grandmother invariably came and invited her to accompany her home.

At first her mother did not know what to make of the invariable correctness of these little prophecies, and, in fact, she does not know yet, as she is wholly a matter-of-fact, hard-working woman who has never given any attention to and really has no knowledge whatever of strange matters. She simply recognizes that Mabel's announcements in regard to future occurrences can be relied upon and that she is very different from the rest of her little flock and from the children who are their companions.

ONCE A PRINTER'S "DEVIL."

Now Maj. Scofield Becomes Governor of Wisconsin.

Maj. Edward Scofield, who has been elected Governor of Wisconsin, is a product of the farm and the printer's case. He is 54 years old. His life up to the time he was 13 was passed on his father's farm in Pennsylvania. His schooling was had during the winter months when there was no work to do on "the place." Before he was 14 he became a printer's "devil" in a newspaper office, and in time became a setter of type. He followed that line of life until the war came, and then he enlisted on the first call for troops. He was made a first lieutenant at Fredericksburg, and then a captain. In May, 1864, he was captured by the rebels and spent a year in the prisons of the Confederates at Danville, Andersonville, Charleston and other places, as the enemy was driven from point to point. On March 5, 1865, he was paroled and liberated. On his release he was commissioned a major for gallant conduct at the battle of the Wilderness. Maj. Scofield went west after the war and took Unimpeachable Alibi.

Newspapers are always ready to correct their errors of statement, though those who enter complaints are sometimes fussy and over-sensitive. The aggrieved person who wrote the following note to the Woodstock Sentinel, however, had certainly been misrepresented:

"Dear Sir—Please allow a correction of a misstatement in regard to myself, by your correspondent, in Saturday's issue of your paper. I had not been 'attending the hospital' in your town, as represented, but serving a month's time in Woodstock jail."—Lewiston Journal.

Brain-Work.

The Washington Star has surprised two high-school girls talking about their graduation essays.

"Have you written yours yet?" asked Maud.

"Yes," answered Ethel.

"Wasn't it a lot of work?"

"Just dreadful! First, I had to hunt up words that were big enough, and then I had to keep looking in the dictionary to see what they meant, and honestly, I began to think I never should get it finished!"

Lots of people are robbed who never say anything about it.

In a study of the visibility of lights at sea, made by a commission of the German Government, it has been found that a white light of one candle power is visible at a distance of 2,000 yards on a clear night, and at a mile only on a rainy night. When a white light of one-candle power was visible at one mile, one of three-candle power was visible at two miles, of ten-candle power at four miles, and of nineteen candle power at five miles. A green light of one-candle power was seen at .8 of a mile, and to be visible at one, two, three and four miles the candle must be two, fifteen, fifty-one and 106, respectively.

THE LINE RIDER.

Over the mesa, 'neath the milk-white moon,
Leisurely riding through the wonder-night,
Went Sanderson, line rider, full of dreams
Of young Dolores, sweetest of brown maids.
(Something lies hidden in the coyote grass.)

Only a month ago those canyon walls,
Moon-white, beheld a shadowy train wind down—
Contrabandista, laden with mescal;
Pepe their chief, exultant, almost home.
(Something lies sullen in the coyote grass.)

Apache rumors had preceded them,
Herding white settlers homeward. Sanderson,
Frontier wise, watched the canny Mexicans,
Saw them untroubled; couched, and got his prey.
(Something lies vengeful in the coyote grass.)

Musing, his firm mouth smiling now and then
With reminiscent tenderness, he rode,
Unheeding how that Pepe had fled unscathed,
Until his horse, snorting and trembling, shied—
(A sudden spring from out the coyote grass!)

Oh, brown Dolores! musing 'neath the moon
That floods the homely old adobe walls,
Ask Pepe, when he comes to you to-night,
Whose horse he rides? What makes his dagger dark?
(Something lies silent in the coyote grass!)

THE ACTOR'S DOUBLE.

We were talking about spirit manifestations at the Thirty-nine Club, and retailing the usual second or third-hand accounts of deceased ladies and gentlemen showing themselves to their sorrowing relatives.

"It is strange the tricks which our brains will sometimes play us," said Dr. Macpherson. "I remember once seeing a ghost myself, and I can tell you that the sensation is a very curious one. It was a good many years ago, in my examination days, and I had been sitting up until the early hours 'cramming.' Everybody in the house had long since gone to bed, where I ought to have been myself, so I was rather surprised when I glanced up from my book to see somebody sitting at the table where I myself had been a few moments before writing. I felt quite startled for an instant, until I recognized the intruder. He was a little hazy, but I could see plainly enough who it was."

"A dead relative?" asked Major Dennett, who was a firm believer in good, old-fashioned ghosts.

Macpherson answered in his peculiarly quiet way: "No, it was myself. The experience of seeing one's own ghost is not altogether unusual, I believe."

"Now, I do not think your experience was half so remarkable as one of mine," said Gilbert Dane, the well-known actor and manager of the Howard Theater, who happened to be there that night. Dane is not a member of the Thirty-nine, but had come with Macpherson. Most of the brain specialist's friends are in the profession, a fact which is, perhaps, due to the year which he himself spent on the stage as a young man.

"My story begins prosaically," said the actor, when we begged to hear it. "I lost the latchkey with which I let myself into the theater, and took somebody else's to the locksmith's to have a duplicate made. I agreed to call for it the following morning as I was going up to town for rehearsal. I was living at Putney then, and we were actively preparing a play which deserved a better fate than it received, if thought and preparation go for anything, for I came near making myself ill over it. I was feeling out of sorts on the morning that I called for the latchkey, and when the locksmith swore positively that he had given me the thing already—that less than ten minutes previously I had come for the key, paid for it, and taken it away with me—I will confess that I lost my temper, and stormed at the fellow, but I could not get him to budge a line from his story. He seemed to have an idea that I was playing a practical joke, and the only result of my talking was that I nearly lost my train at Waterloo. It was moving when I reached the platform, and I had to run for the only compartment of which the door was open, near the end of the train.

"The compartment contained two other passengers, but if I glanced at them at all I noticed nothing except that each was pretty well hidden behind a daily paper. I had fortunately bought my own paper before calling at the locksmith's, and I speedily followed their example. So far the story is painfully commonplace. Now comes the truly remarkable experience which has stamped the doings of that day indelibly on my memory."

The actor paused to strike a match and relight his cheroot, which he had allowed to go out, and we all watched him in silence, wondering what was coming. Macpherson only had the air of a man who had heard the story before.

"I had become rather interested in my paper," Dane went on, when the cigar was alight again, "and did not notice my companions talking until one of them started telling an anecdote. Then it gradually dawned upon me that the story he was telling was one that I considered my own particular property, and when I listened it struck me that the story was being told, not only in my exact words, but also in my own voice.

"The story and the voice startled me, but it is difficult to describe my feelings when I put down my paper to glance at the narrator."

"It was yourself?" asked Major Dennett excitedly as the actor paused, and Dane nodded.

"Yes, gentlemen, I saw seated at the other end of the compartment, by the window, opposite his companion, a figure that was an exact facsimile of the reflection which I see in my glass every day when I have dressed for the part of a respectable citizen. It was myself, complete in every detail of face and attire."

"An optical delusion, I suppose?" I suggested, and the actor shook his head.

"No; that was the first idea that occurred to me—that I had been working and worrying too much over the new play, and my brain had played me a trick. The unconcerned way in which the third man glanced at me encouraged me in the belief, for the likeness, unless I was imagining it, was enough to attract instant attention. I wondered whether there was actually a man sitting and talking where I had seen and heard my facsimile; for the third man, an ordinary, every-day individual, had not spoken a word to him, and might from his expression have been listening to his anecdote or simply thinking. I was relieved when he laughed at the point when my 'double,' as I began to call his companion, came to the joke of the story, but when he opened his mouth it was only to increase the mystery of the affair, for it showed me that my double possessed my name, as well as my voice, my dress, my face, my figure.

"I began to wonder then not whether the man at the window was a reality, but whether I was really myself, and it certainly would not have surprised me if I had looked in a mirror and found it reflect back a face that was unfamiliar to me. It is strange how quickly a single phenomenon will sometimes change all one's fixed opinions on a subject of the supernatural. I felt I must speak to the man if only to prove whether I was awake or dreaming, and I seized the opportunity of introducing myself by hearing 'my double' called by my name.

"'Excuse me,' I said, addressing him, 'but I heard your friend just now call you "Mr. Dane." I wonder whether we are related at all, for that happens to be my name, and we seem to bear a striking similarity to one another.'

"'My double' turned and surveyed me through his single eyeglass in exactly the same manner as that with which I should have surveyed a stranger who addressed me in the train.

"'I really do not know whether we are related,' he said, in the voice I use when I wish to be slightly patronizing. 'I am Gilbert Dane of the Howard Theater,' and he actually handed me one of my own cards.

"There was something in the substantial nature of the familiar bit of pasteboard that brought back a little of my common sense and relieved me from the state of stupefaction into which the phenomenon had driven me.

"'Come, this is a very clever trick,' I said with a smile, which I am afraid was rather feeble. 'You have certainly succeeded in startling me. Now I should like your own card, so that I may know whom to congratulate on a very clever performance.'"

"And what did the mystery do?" I inquired with interest when the actor paused.

"He did exactly what I should have done if a stranger addressed me in the same manner. He became angry and asked me what I meant and whom I called myself.

"'Well, until to-day I have been in the habit of calling myself Gilbert Dane of the Howard Theater——' I was beginning, keeping as cool as I could, when 'my double' interrupted me in a tone which I still recognized perfectly as my own.

"'Well! you had better not do so any more,' he said, sharply, 'or you will find yourself in the hands of the police. I see that you have been imitating my dress, too, which I cannot help, but the use of my name is another thing.'

"We had just reached Vauxhall, our first stopping place, as he spoke, and a ticket collector who knows me by sight came to the door. My double caught his eye first.

"'I wish you would tell this gentleman who I am,' he said, and the man answered promptly:

"'Certainly, sir; you are Mr. Dane, the actor.'

"He looked startled when I asked him the same question.

"'I should call you a very good imitation,' he said when he had recovered from his surprise.

"This was becoming decidedly uncomfortable, and I began to wonder how I could prove to anybody that I was not a good imitation of myself. The ticket collector's ready acceptance of my double as the real 'Mr. Dane' showed me how helpless I should be in an appeal to anyone who did not know me well. But I felt that it would not do for two Gilbert Danes to remain at large. The question which one was to surrender the title must be settled at once. It struck me that the easiest way to do it would be to go together to the theater and submit the questions to the company assembled for the rehearsal. I suggested this course to my facsimile, and he surprised me by accepting it readily.

"'I warn you that I shall detain you when it is settled and send for the police,' he said in my haughtiest voice.

"It was what I was intending to do with him."

"And did you both go back?" somebody asked.

The actor paused to light another cheroot.

Dane nodded.

"Yes, together. The third man left us at Waterloo," he said. "You may not believe it, but I felt rather uneasy as I approached the stage door, and the fact that I had no latchkey to open it for myself seemed a calamity. 'My double' calmly produced his and marched me into my own theater with the air of a proprietor. Then he closed the door behind him, and, changing his voice and manner, suddenly turned quietly: 'And now, Mr. Dane, I will puzzle you no more, but apologize for giving you so much trouble, which I hope you will think repaid by the enjoyment of a unique sensation. The fact is that I am very anxious to go on the stage under your auspices, and I thought that this would be the best way to obtain an introduction to you, and at the same time show you a specimen of my acting in the part of your understudy. You will admit at least that I understand the art of making up. Now are you going to give me an engagement or to send for the police."

"And you gave him the engagement, I suppose?" I asked.

"Yes; I have always regretted that he threw it up before the year was out, and returned to his former profession, that of a medical man."

"It was he, of course, that called for the latchkey in the morning?"

"Yes; he had been in the shop when I ordered it, and the fact finally determined him to carry out the affair which he had been pondering for some time."

"But he must have haunted you like a shadow beforehand," put in Major Dennett, "to learn all your gestures and that. I should hardly think the result was worth the trouble."

Macpherson, who had been sitting quietly in the background, surprised us by replying for his friend.

"Excuse me, Major," he said, in his usual quiet way, "but you make a mistake there. Any man would have been glad to give £100 down for the engagement which Dane offered me straight away. It cost me less than £10 for clothes, and about a month of study; and my time was not worth £90 a month then, or I should not have thought of giving up medicine and taking to the stage."—Tid-Bits.

Uses for the Orange.

In view of the prospects of the future developments in orange production in this country, attention has been drawn to the supplementary uses to which the products of the orange tree can be put. In their natural state the orange flowers serve to flavor drinks, candies, etc. When distilled they yield the much-esteemed orange flower water, and an essential oil called neroli. When treated with sugar, the flowers form a delicious candy, which is said to be not only exceptionally palatable, but more wholesome than many other productions of the confectioner's art. The flowers are selected with care, weighed and immersed in cold water for twenty-four hours, after which they are dipped in cold water, rewashed, and finally spread out on a linen cloth or sheet to dry. When quite dry they are laid out in low, wide dishes, each flower separate from its fellow, and then sprinkled with double their weight of sugar, administered at intervals over a period of eight days. They are meanwhile moved and kept in the shade. At the expiration of that time they are once more placed in the sun, whose rays dry them completely. The orange flower water is made of equal proportions in weight of blossoms and water, which yield on an average about one-fifth of a pound weight of water and flowers and aqua nanfa, with about .007 per cent of essential oil. At present the best manufactories of orange flower water are to be found in France, where a spirit called petit grain is produced by the distillation of the leaves.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

An Apple Problem.

Once upon a time there were two old men who sat in the market early every morning and sold apples. Each one had thirty apples, and one of the old men sold two for a cent, and the other old man sold three for a cent. In that way the first old man got fifteen cents for his basket of apples, while the second old man received ten cents; so that together they made twenty-five cents each day. But one day the old apple-man who sold three for a cent was too sick to go to the market, and he asked his neighbor to take his apples and sell them for him. This the other old man very kindly consented to do, and when he got to the market with the two baskets of apples, he said to himself, "I will put all the apples into one basket, for it will be easier than picking them out of two baskets." So he put the sixty apples into one basket, and he said to himself, "Now if I sell two apples for one cent, and my old friend sells three for one cent, that is the same thing as selling five apples for two cents. Therefore I will sell five for two cents." When he had sold the sixty apples he found he had only twenty-four cents, which was right, because there are twelve fives in sixty, and twice twelve are twenty-four. But if the other old man had been there, and each had sold his apples separately, they would have received twenty-five cents. Now, how is that explained?—St. Nicholas.

Joan of Arc Before the Judges.

The questions addressed to Joan, and her answers day by day, have been transmitted in the records of the court. To read them is to understand the brutal ferocity with which she was tortured, until, turning on her accuser, she cried, "You call yourself my judge; be careful what you do, for I am indeed sent by the Lord, and you place yourself in great danger."

To answers almost sublime succeeded answers filled with naive ingenuity. Questions were plied, traitorously conceived, concerning the visions which had come to her, and the celestial voices which she heard, and which throughout her mission had counseled and guided her. But on this point she was firmly silent. It was as though it were a secret which she was forbidden to betray. She consented to take an oath to speak nothing but the truth, but concerning her visions she made a reservation. "You could cut my head off before I would speak," she protested. At night, in the darkness of her dungeon, St. Catherine and St. Margaret appeared to her, and celestial voices comforted her. She avowed that she had seen them "with the eyes of her body * * *" and when they leave me," she added, "I wish that they would take me with them."—Century.

Must Wait Upon the Servants.

Considerable interest has been aroused in England by the news that the Legislature of New Zealand has just passed a law creating a statutory half holiday for domestic servants. According to the measure the employer is obliged to turn every servant out of the house between 3 p. m. and 10 p. m. on one day each week. The half holiday is compulsory, not only in the sense that the employer is bound to grant it, but in the sense that the servant is bound to take it, and if any servant is found at work during the statutory half holiday the unfortunate employer is liable to a fine of $25. Should the servant return for meals during the half holiday—and this is one of the most beautiful provisions of the new law—the master or mistress will have to minister to the wants of the domestic. Under the circumstances it is only natural that every hired girl in New Zealand will make it a point of coming home to tea on her half holiday, the privilege of being waited upon by one's employer being a right which no "lady help" would willingly forego.

It is usually said of the people who haven't a lick of sense on earth that they have very happy dispositions.

W. H. Green, of Alexandria, Ohio, Has an Unenviable Experience.

Mr. Green Was for Years a Great Sufferer with Locomotor Ataxia—He at Last Finds a Cure and Certifies Before a Notary to the Truth of the Statement.

From the American, Newark, Ohio.

If an article has the indorsement of all classes of people, it must have merit.

The merchant, the housewife, the farmer, are all loud in their praises of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

Mr. W. H. Green, who lives near Alexandria, Ohio, in St. Albans township, is one of the most prominent farmers in Licking County, and his word as to the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People will have an assuring effect on his many friends and neighbors. They have confidence in him.

Mr. Green was in the American office recently and was enthusiastic in his praise of these pills. His story told in his own words is about as follows:

"About six years ago I suffered from an attack of grip, which resulted in locomotor ataxia. From this I suffered a living death. I was for a long time unable to help myself and was a constant burden to my family. One day I read in the Weekly American about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and I concluded that as it had helped others similarly afflicted it might help me. I went to R. W. Smith, our druggist, at Alexandria, and bought a box of the pills. The first results were promising, and I purchased several more boxes. They had a wonderfully reviving influence on my system. From a helpless invalid not able to dress myself, I have increased in strength and health and now do my ordinary work about the farm, and walk to Alexandria, which is about a half mile away, every day. I tell you those pills have done me a wonderful amount of good, and I am willing to take my oath of that."

State of Ohio, Licking County, ss.:

Personally appeared before me, a Notary Public in and for said county, Mr. W. H. Green, of St. Albans township, who being first duly sworn, says that he was a great sufferer from locomotor ataxia, and that he received great relief from that disease by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

W. H. GREEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me by the said W. H. Green this 14th day of July, 1896.

JAS. R. FITZGIBBON,

Mr. Green, whose venerable appearance, with his long, silvery beard and benevolent countenance, adds conviction to his words, has lived in St. Albans township for nearly sixty years, and his word can be absolutely depended upon. A Chance to Make Money.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the washer, and every washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to per minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now and I am sure that I can clear $5,000 a year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Station A. Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money it's your own fault. MRS. W. Marry This Girl Somebody'

I have been reading in your paper about several men and women, that have been very successful selling self-heating flat-irons, and I c ncluded I would see what a girl could do. I have worked 12 days and have sold 151 irons and have $218 left after paying all expenses. Everybody is delighted with it, as people think they can't afford to be without one as they save fuel and time and don't burn the clothes. I know I ca clear five thousand dollars in a year. How is that for a girl? A GRADUATE.

Counting the Vote.

It is perhaps the province of a newspaper, to impart information as well as to give current news. So without wishing to intrude our own personality into the circle of the COURIER'S readers, we feel we can add a little to their stock of knowledge, by giving a synopsis of the manner in which the electoral vote is gathered and counted every four years. It is considered so important a matter, involving as it does, the interests of the greatest nation on earth, that following a provision in the national constitution the various states have made laws, explicity showing how it is to be done. Previous to each presidential election, each governor appoints one man in each of the congressional districts of his state, whose duty it is to visit each county seat in his district and receive from the county clerk, the official vote given to each presidential elector on each and every of the party tickets voted for. This vote is to be carried to the state capital by such election marshal, on the fourth Monday in November. He must on that day, deliver them to the secretary of state between the hours of 10 a. m. and 12 noon. Then that afternoon, between the hours of 12 noon and 4 p. m. all these marshals meet, and in their presence and in the presence of the governor and secretary of state, each district is canvassed, county by county, to see no mistakes have been. In our own state, this means a difficult and hurried piece of work, especially the canvass in the afternoon when so many tickets are in the field. Under the old way of voting, and with but two or three parties, the time from 12 to 4 would do very well. But this year, and with the Australian system of voting we had five full sets of electors, and two elections at large for the last ticket, the socialist-labor. This made 77 names to call, for 92 counties, or a total of 7084 calls. So it is impossible to do this in the hours named. Even the making of the returns to the secretary of state in the forenoon, has to be shortened by having the county clerks send in duplicate copies in advance, and when the marshal of a given district is called, he and the secretary of state or his deputy, read the totals rapidly to ascertain if they agree. And in case the numbers do not agree that brought in by the marshal must be accepted.

In the afternoon meeting, on this occasion, the marshals met in the large parlors of the governor's suite of rooms and beginning with the first district each county was read. After calling the first elector, who always stood highest it was found that other electors generally had about the same vote, in which case the reader. Gov. Matthews' secretary, Myron D. King, would shorten the work by adding "all the rest are" so and so, while the assistant secretary of state kept watch on the figures he already had filled out in an official book. Again in case of disagreement the figures, the returns brought in by the marshal, were allowed to stand. In going over the districts, the Third was omitted as the marshal of that district was not present, and no communication could be had with him. The Thirteenth district was finished at 4:30, and then the Third was gone over. In this case, the governor's private secretary, read from the duplicate copy sent in by the county clerks, while the deputy secretary of state, held the book into which he had copied these duplicates. This of course settled nothing except to correct the work of copying. This call ended with Washington county at 4:45. The governor then called each marshal, by districts and each signed record. This ended the formal part.

NOTES.

The gold democrats polled but few votes in any county, running mainly from 5 to 25 to a county. Ohio county had none, Allen had 149 and Marion about 500.

It was noticed that in each case, for the two leading parties the first elector received from 5 to 25 more votes than his associates. This was caused by the mistake of stamping the first elector under the belief that it would be voting a straight ticket. But it voted only for that one elector. Another queer thing, and one not easily explained, was the vote for the 12th and 13th district electors. These varied very frequently, and in such a way that the 12th generally lost one or two, though not always. In this way, Frank VanAuken lost a few votes now and then, in distant parts of the state where he certainly had no acquaintances. It cannot be accounted for. After the two electors at large, the districts generally stood at the same figure till the Twelfth was reached.

In Knox county, the Marshal's copy showed "39" in figures for the gold standard vote, but the words, which were also, always given, showed "twenty-nine," and of course, as is the custom, the words were accepted and the vote was recorded at "twenty-nine."

Marshal county had sent to the secretary of state, John B. Stoll's vote, as the first democratic elector at large, as 3543, which he had got by adding Stoll's 3498 democratic votes to his 45 populist votes. This was right, no doubt, but on comparing this, with the report the same clerk gave to Wm. Conrad, the marshal for the Thirteenth district, it was found that the one brought in by the marshal showed 3543 for Stoll, with a separate list of votes given by the populists. So after considerable discussion the board followed the precedent they had adopted and so far followed, of letting the marshals report govern. So, the 45 populist votes were added to Stoll's full vote of 3543, thus giving him the populist vote twice and making his total 3588. It is a pretty fine question, as to this little point would have been settled, had the vote of the state or of any important local office depended on it. As it was the majorities given in national, state and local offices were so large one way or the other, that this 45 cut no figure.

In Howard county, there was a difference of 3 in the two reports, and Stoll got that many more on the marshal's report.

In Scott county, Thayer, the first republican elector got but one vote higher than the rest, showing they knew how to vote.

In the reports from the Twelfth district, no errors were found. This is a compliment to the efficiency of its six county clerks, and to the various boards.

Brown county had but one gold democrats, and it and Ohio county had none on the prohibition or the socialist labor ticket.

Where a marshal fails in his duty as did the one in the Third district there seems to be no law to punish him. If there is none, the next legislature should attend to it.

Thin, Pale Children

One satisfaction in giving Scott's Emulsion to children is they never object to it. The fact is, they soon become fond of it. Another satisfaction is because it will make them plump, and give them growth and prosperity. It should be given to all children who are too thin, or too pale. It does not make them over-fat, but plump.

It strengthens the digestive organs and the nerves, and furnishes material for rich blood.

Old Couple Robbed

BOUND HAND AND FOOT IN THEIR COUNTRY HOME

By Robbers, Who Carried Away About $100 Which Was Hoarded in a Safe —No Clue as to the Thieves

Fort Wayne Sentinel.

Leonard Hartman, aged seventy-five years, and his wife about six years younger, living alone on their farm in Fairfield townsnip, DeKalb county, were suddenly awakened from their slumber Thursday night by three men who had made an entrance through a window and appeared in their sleeping apartments, with handkerchiefs tied over their faces and revolvers in their hands. The unwelcome callers demanded of the old people their money. The robbers threatened to burn their house and do violence to them if they did not disclose the hiding place of their money. They proceeded to bind the old gentleman hand and foot with cords or ropes. The old lady was also tied to the bedstead. The old gentleman finally told them all the money they had was in the safe, which they at once took possession of. The old lady also told them where a few dollars of her money were to be found. In all they secured a little over $100, mostly in gold They left the house saying they would return shortly and untie their victims, but did not do so. The old gentleman succeeded in loosing the rope which bound him, and then untied the cords which bound his wife. Neither was seriously injured but both were badly frightened. After leaving the house the thieves went to the barn and hitched Mr. Hartman's horse to a light wagon or buggy and drove to this city. When daylight came the horse and wagon were found in the barnyard. After reaching the here they had evidently turned horse loose and he had returned home without the aid of a driver

Mr Hartman describes one of the robbers as being tall and slim with dark hair. Another, as short and havily built, and the other as medium height and size. Levi Hartman a son of the victims, came here yesterday and secured the assistance of the officers in looking after the trio, but at last accounts nothing that appears a probable clue has been discovered.

I saw in your paper that a 13 year old boy made $1.25 the first hour he worked selling the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick. I ordered a sample and went to work and the first week I cleared $10, the second week I cleared $15. I expect to run it up to $25 a week in the near future, as the Perfection Metal Tip Lampwick makes such a beautiful white light and does away with smoky chimneys and bad oder and saves oil. it is easy to sell. If you wish to try it send 13 cent stamps to Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A. St. Louis, Mo, and she will send you sample outfit, this is a good way to make money around home. MISS TINA W.

Back to the Farm.

Indianapolis Sun.

After serving two years as secretary of state and four years as governor, Claude Matthews will return to his farm in Vermillion county, about the middle of January. His term of office as governor expires Jan. 11, when he is to be succeeded by a farmer from Montgomery county, James A. Mount. Altogether, the governor owns 1,900 acres of land in Vermillion county, located near Clinton. Since his advent into public life many needed improvements on his farm were necessarily postponed, but now that he will return he expects to look after the property more carefully.

It is said that the salary of the governor has fallen far short of the expenses incurred in the duties of the office. Some are advocating that the office receive a greater salary, and it would not be a surprise if the matter were taken up by the next legislature. A governor is in a position where the demands on his pocketbook are so frequent as to be almost constant.

The Wonderful Churn.

I want to add my testimony to the list of those that have used the Lightning Churn. It does all that is claimed of it; you can churn easily in one minute and get a large percentage more butter than with the common churns. I never took the agency for anything before, but so many of my neighbors wanted churns that I ordered 30 and they are all gone. I think in a year nearly every farmer will have a Lightning Churn, in fact they can't afford to be without one as they make so much more butter, and a good little bit of money can be made in every township selling these churns. By writing to J. F. Casey & Co., St. Louis, Mo., you can get circulars and full particulars about the churn A READER. 3

Party Nominations

There is a strong sentiment growing among our people especially among the taxpayers, that there should be made a law governing the caucuses and conventions that make party nominations. Heretofore these caucuses and conventions have been merely voluntary and except so far as custom made them binding, they have no force, whatever. When the Australian ballot law was enacted, it recognized the certificate of the presiding officer and secretary of these meetings, but threw no further safeguards of law about their action. Had the legislature at that time made a plain law on the subject, one that would be as binding as the Australian ballot law itself, we would not now, here in DeKalb county find ourselves with two needless and costly lawsuits on our hands.

Close Voting

Our people will remember how Ohio, with a very large vote, split its electoral ticket four years ago. This was owing to the fact that the first elector on the democratic ticket ran ahead so that he got more votes than the lowest man on the republican ticket, and his one vote went for Cleveland. A similar condition now exists in Kentucky, than the [illegible] the first democratic elector got more than the lowest republican elector. So one of Kentucky's votes will go for Bryan, the rest for McKinley. California also gets one Bryan elector.

Almost a Blaze

While W. H. McIntyre's little son, Harry, was playing with histoy engine and train of cars, yesterday afternoon, the engine upset and the burning gasolene that furnishes the power, was spilled on the carpet, setting it on fire. Two large holes were burned and the carpet, a fine brussels, was ruined. It was fully insured in one of Walter Hartman's fire companies. Had it not been that help was at hand, there might have been a serious fire.

Can't Be.

There is a report going over the state, that Supt. Geeting will ask the legislature to pass a law compelling all teachers in the common schools, to pass an examination in Latin, before being licensed. We are not prepared to believe Mr. Geeting to be such a fool as that, and will wait for further developments before passing an opinion on such a scheme.

Those Suits

The suits in regard to the surveyor's office, will, will soon come up for trial at Angola. Next Monday is set for the one that VanAuken brings to prove that he was regularly nominated and that Krontz was not. Dec. 21, comes up a case in which Mr. Krontz the recently elected surveyor, will ask the courts to give him possession of the instruments and office furniture now held by Mr. VanAuken who refuses to give them up, at least till his own case in court is decided against him.

—Albion, New Era: Two years ago a joint resolution was passed by the general assembly providing for the amending of the constitution so as to permit the use of voting by a machine as well as by ballot. This resolution will again be brought up at the coming session of the legislature and if passed will then be submitted to the voters of the state for their ratification at the next general election. If a majority of the voters favor it, then it will become a part of the constitution. But that does not mean that we will necessarily use machines, it only permits them to be if these in authority desire to use them. A machine costs from $300 to 450 each which means that the new innovation would be an expense of several thousand dollars to each county.

Whew!!

On Thanksgiving day the two Indiana schools of Hartville and Moores Hill met at Osgood for a match game of football. They were at it hot and heavy, when some boys outside the ground discovered a nest of skunks in a hollow log. They scared out the skunks, drove them into the ball grounds, and then there was fun—for the boys and skunks. The game came to a sudden end, the players, as fast as as they got a whiff of the new comers, scattering right and left. The spectators also, took one wild look, smelled one loud smell, and flew the scene. In two minutes there was no living thing on the grounds but the skunks. Even the boys were at a safe distance. Football is said to be at a discount in that part of Hoosierdom now. The tailors are having a big boom making new clothes for the football students of the two institutions. The little animals are temporarily the "Advance agents."

—Word comes to the COURIER that Joseph Stafford came near meeting with a serious accident at the Wabash depot Wednesday night. He was assisting a lady and baby on the train and it seems in getting off hurriedly he struck against the switch post and bounded back against the train. The train was stopped and with lanterns a search for Joe was begun at once. They soon discovered him at a safe distance from the track. Joe is too quick to allow even a moving train to hit him. He was not injured in the least. Joe is quite a sprinter. Early Thanksgiving morning his calf got loose and ran west past the Junction, Joe followed close to its heels and when he catched it he found he was one and a half miles west of the Junction.

—The special election in Fulton county, Wednesday, brought out a new election case, and the republican that office stood at a tie. The result of the special election gives the republicans 52 in the house, and democrats 48, a majority of 4 for the former.

—Warden Harley of the northern state prison, in his recent reports, recomend the repeal of the law requiring that prisoners upon the expiration of their terms of sentence be returned by the sheriff of the jail door of the county in which conviction was had and released. He suggests that upon the release of a prisoner he be given $10 in money, a serviceable suit of clothes and be providee with transporation to any point within the prison district that he may desire to go.

—If a woman takes her baby to a public meeting it cries and she is abused. If it is left at home she is abused for neglecting it A woman can't stay at home all the time and every neighborhood hasn,t its good old woman who is willing to come in and care for baby for five cents. A little of the charity that is given to the man who snores in the front seat should be given to the tired little woman in the back seat with a restless baby.

—Sam Jones says this is the greatest country on the face of the earth for a young man. A. T. Stewart taught school at 27. Cornelius Vanderbilt didn't have two shirts when he started his ferry. Jay Gould peddled rat traps in New York. Elihu Burritt's wife taught him letter after he was married. Leland Stanford's father was sent adrift without a cent at nineteen, Carnegie worked in Pittsburg for a dollar a day forty year ago. Abraham Lincoln mauled rails on an Illinois farm. This country is all right if you want to be a man. If you don't you can find lots of company.

—The immense popular majority received by Major McKinley and his goodly majority in the electoral college tend alike to conceal the real narrowness of the votes in several states. If there had been a change of less than 26,000 votes in the aggregate in nine states, Bryan would have been elected president of the United States, McKinley's majority in California, Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, West Virginia and Wyoming combined was less than 52,000, and the nine states cast sixty electoral votes. A change of only about 26,000 votes would have given the sixty electoral votes of these nine states to Bryan; and these sixty electoral votes would have elected him president of the United States

A GREEDY ORIENTAL.

Late Shah Was Close-Fisted and Hindered Progress by His Parsimony.

The greatest defect of the Shah was his avarice, which was immense and insatiable; and although this is a fault common among Oriental despots, who feel that their power can only be made secure from attack by the command of a full treasury, yet it injured and often ruined his schemes for the development of his country. If he had been content to spend some portion of his hoards on public improvements, on the repair of ancient reservoirs and water courses, and the construction of roads and bridges, he would have brought under cultivation tracts of cultivatable land which are now desert and would have largely benefited both his own revenue and the general trade of the country. But he could not make up his mind to spend money, and required every improvement not only to pay for itself but to bring a large contribution to his own treasury.

The concessions which were given to all comers for manufactures, mines, tramways, roads, banks, monopolies for lotteries, electric lighting, tobacco culture, and other schemes, were in no case assisted by state money, but all had to surrender a share of their profits, real or problematical, to the shah. The consequence was that the greater number of these industrial undertakings, which, in a strange country, and among a suspicious population, required constant support and large pecuniary assistance from the government, soon withered and disappeared, and the shah not only lost his anticipated profit, but solid and honorable financiers were deterred from adventuring in so unpropitious a country. The ground was left free to less honest speculators, who applied for concessions, not to work them seriously, but to pass them on for a consideration to others who might successfully plant them in the often credulous markets of Europe. Disaster followed, the credit of Persia was lowered, and sound enterprises were seriously injured by the collapse of worthless speculations.—Nineteenth Century.

Simplicity the Rule.

Garnishing has become of late such a fine art and is attended by such [illegible] results as to seriously withal so labor-saving in result [illegible] housekeepers will hesitate to part with it for the more cumbersome and elaborate method of other days. It adds much to the ease and dignified movement of the modern meal to have only the necessary glass and silver together with the decoration of flowers, fruit and lights on the table. The courses are then served from side table, buffet or butler's pantry without delay of carving, mistake or confusion. The host and hostess are free to devote themselves to conversation and the amusement of their guests without interruption, which is a great advantage. Chefs are making an effort to restore the French service, at which all dishes are first presented at the table and afterwards taken away to be carved and served. Thudicum, in his "Spirit of Cookery," explains the intent of this display of showy dishes by the oft-repeated quotation "one eats with the eye." In other words that the beauty of food is a pleasure to sight, as its perfect delicate flavor is to palate, and in this way ministers to two senses rather than one. It is to be hoped, however, that the modern hostess will not be deprived of the convenience of the napkin, or the pretty service a la Russe, until the presentation of something much better reconciles her to their loss. Except on anniversary occasions and intended to serve as a souvenir, the menu is seldom seen in private enertaining. At a formal dinner the name card is a convenience in seating guests in the order previously decided upon by the hostess without possibilities of mistake. A card is now given each gentleman before entering the drawing-room, bearing his own name, and that of the lady he is to take in to dinner. This is true courtesy on the part of a hostess, as the value of a bright little talk between them before the beginning of the meal adds much to its enjoyment and success.

Two Theories.

Fond mother (in passenger car with her children)—"It just scared me when I read—Johnny! Stop pulling flowers off the lady's bonnet—when I read in the papers—Richard! You must keep your head in—the paper the other day that—George! If you put your sticky hands on that lady's dress again I'll thrash you—the other day that a woman went crazy—Richard! Don't you dare slap that little girl—when I read that a woman went crazy just from the discomforts of the—Johnny! Stop punching that gentleman—of the journey in a railroad train. I wonder if she had children with her?"

Lady (quietly)—"Perhaps some other woman had."—New York Weekly.

To Cure Indigestion in Children.

Indigestion in children can be cured by carefully watching and vigilantly preaching the wholesome doctrine of mastication. Teach the child that every morsel he swallows without chewing it thoroughly is so much poison to his body. Children are tenacious of life, and may be made to believe the truth of this statement.

MEDICAL AMENITIES IN BRAZIL.

Experiences of Dr. Fort, Who Criticised Brazilian Doctors.

In 1880 a French medical graduate named Fort established himself at Rio de Janeiro, where he soon acquired a great reputation as a skillful surgeon, thereby somewhat arousing the jealousy of the local practitioners. Returning to Paris after some years of expatriation he published his impressions of the Brazilian capital, making particular mention of the defective system of instruction in operation at the School of Medicine, and animadverting with much severity on the extreme lack of zeal manifested by the students. A few months ago Dr. Fort again visited Rio de Janeiro, but had it not been for the intervention of the French ambassador the reception he was accorded by his former colleagues and their pupils might well have been attended by serious consequences. The following description of the fracas is furnished by a local paper: "At midday Our door street was blocked by upward of 500 students crying with one voice, 'Death to Fort!' Dividing into groups they then proceeded to the various newspaper offices in the town, demanding the co-operation of the press in publishing the base maligner who, in their persons, had dared to insult the whole of Brazil and its inhabitants. After this they searched the hotels for their victim in order to lynch him, but happily Dr. Fort was absent from the city that day. Thus foiled they organized an execution in effigy with a funeral procession, the starting point of which was at the Medical Faculty. Upward of a thousand students accordingly emerged from the faculty the next morning in regular order, each individual carrying in his hand a lighted taper, while at the head of the column there was a catafalque with a coffin containing the effigy. On either side robed students bearing extra large candles marched as pallbearers, and scattered along the line was a plentiful display of banners decorated with asses' heads and uncomplimentary allusions to Brazil's calumniator. So realistic was the whole scene that prayers for the dead were chanted while the procession was en route, and when the final act of cremation took place in San Francisco square it was accompanied by the solemn strains of 'De Profundis.'" By a later account we learn that Dr. Fort "was able to embark on the La Plata safe and sound," and also [illegible] that Bra-

Thackeray's Two Dragons.

One of Thackeray's charming little sketches represents him endeavoring to escape from the room, while a printer's boy leans against the door to keep him in. One day he was visiting the studio of Baron Marochetti, when their host took down a small engraving from the wall and presented it to him. The subject was "St. George and the Dragon." Thackeray inspected it with great delight for a few minutes, until suddenly, becoming grave, he turned to one of his friends and said: "I shall hang it near the head of my bed, where I can see it every morning. We all have our dragons to fight. Do you know yours? I know mine. I have not one, but two." "What are they?" "Indolence and luxury!" "I could not help smiling," says his friend, "as I thought of the prodigious amount of literary labor he had performed, and at the same time remembered the simple comfort of his dwelling next door." "I am serious," Thackeray continued. "I never take up the pen without an effort; I work only from necessity. I never walk out without seeing some pretty, useless thing which I want to buy. Sometimes I pass the same shop window every day for months, and resist the temptation, and think I'm safe; then comes the day of weakness, and I yield. I shall look at this picture and think of my dragons, though I never expect to overcome them."

An Aerial Torpedo.

The torpedo consists of a small sized gas-filled ballon, capable of sustaining for any length of time from thirty to forty pounds at an elevation of from 500 to 1,000 feet above the earth. Inside of the lower or smallend of the balloon is placed a metal cylinder, which contains an electrical device, the purpose of which is to ignite the gas in the balloon at any stated period. Underneath the balloon is suspended a case or basket containing high explosive, similar to dynamite, which explodes with terrific force when striking a hard substance, like the earth or walled embankments. In action, the management of the torpedo is described as very easy and simple, the inventor stating that a corporal's guard can with it accomplish what would require a large force to do by the usual methods now employed in the siege of cities, or the scattering of large bodies of troops. The torpedo complete is small and compact, and a large number can be carried by a few men or a pack animal.

It Was an Awful Blow.

A Kansas newspaper tells this story: "A. H. Jenkins lives in Kay County. Last June a cyclone knocked the house galleywest. Among other things blown away were his pension papers. The other day these were picked up near Juanita, Chautauqua County, Kan., and mailed to him. They were uninjured." There is really no use in wasting all of the lies on the campaign.

WHAT INDUSTRY CAN DO.

A Worthless Piece of Georgia Land Made to Blossom Like the Rose.

There are acres and acres of land in this vast country of ours that are supposed to be worthless, but which, by a little industry and thrift, can be actually made "to blossom like the rose." A striking example of what can be accomplished in this line is furnished by the following account of a strip of land in Georgia which a few years ago was considered totally unfit for purposes of cultivation, but which today grows some of the finest grapes in the state. The strip of land in question contains seven acres and is situated on the outskirts of the city of Atlanta. Fourteen years ago it was considered nothing more than a barren waste, too poor even to sprout peas. In 1881 a family named Bernard came to this country from Alsace-Lorraine, poor but willing to work. Through the assistance of the agent of a cotton factory they reached Atlanta. By dint of hard labor and economic living they were enabled to gather together a little money and were able to purchase this supposedly worthless piece of land. The old folks immediately planted grapes and set about to reclaim the land, while the children were kept at work in the mill. For three years spades and hoes took the place of the plow, until at length the labor was rewarded. The farm began to bloom and the ruts began to pass away. They bought a cow and pigs and by stint were soon able to get more cows and pigs. A barn was built and every sprig of grass and every weed was cured and put in there. The grapes shortly began to bear and they devoted all their attention henceforth to the grapes, planting more vines. Good dwellings were built, also a wine cellar, and they have progressed till prosperity and comfort crop out on all their surroundings. Nearly the whole of the farm is today devoted to the culture of grapes and the land is not excelled by that of France or any other grape-growing country. The Bernards are now a quite wealthy and respected family.

AS TO SLEEP.

As Deleterious to Indulge in It Too Much as Not Enough.

"In the matter of sleep," remarked a well-known physician, to a Washington Star man, "there are as many peculiar things as there are about eating. What is one man's food is another's poison. That tall or bulky people [illegible] sleep than others, and that women can get along on much less sleep than can men. As with animals, human beings sleep much longer and heartier in the winter than at any other time. People of extreme old age require as much sleep as infants, and it is beneficial to both classes if they can sleep one-half the time, or even a greater portion. There is one thing I would like to impress upon every one, and that is, it is positively injurious for any one to sleep longer than is actually necessary. When you hear people talk of forcing themselves to sleep long hours, it means as much as if they overdrank or overfed themselves. I am strongly of the belief that while six or seven hours are long enough to sleep for the average healthy person, there are those who need an hour or so more, as there are others who thrive mentally and physically on four hours' sleep. 'Early to bed and early to rise' is a splendid doctrine, but in cases where people cannot get to bed early they should not force themselves to rise early. Sleep all you can naturally, but never sleep for sleep's sake any longer than is necessary."

The Queen's Larder.

When a dinner is given at Windsor or Buckingham palace fish to a huge outlay of money is ordered, but for an ordinary family dinner three kinds of fish are put on the table, whiting being almost invariably one of them. A sirloin of beef is cooked every day and put on the sideboard cold for luncheon. Her majesty's wine, which is well known to be incomparable, is kept in the cellars of St. James' palace, and is sent in basketfuls of three dozen to wherever her majesty may be, this being done more for the household and guests than for herself, as when alone she drinks only very weak whisky and water with her meals, by her physician's orders.

"She" Is Dead.

"She" is dead, according to official news from Pretoria. Her real name was Majajie. She was the mythical queen of the so-called Woodbush tribes of South Africa and she is known to have been at least 120 years old, there being official proofs extant to show that she was already reigning as a semi-divine more than a century ago. Queen Majajie was the original of the heroine in Rider Haggard's well known and popular novel "She."—Argonaut.

Why They Leave.

"Mrs. Mingo is a charming woman, isn't she?"

"Indeed she is, but I notice none of her admirers remain long in her train."

"But they never leave on their own account."

"Oh, fickle, is she?"

"No, a chafing-dish faddist."—Cleveland Plaindealer.

Letter Carriers Use Electric Lights.

THE MOSLEM WORLD.

Its Wrath Rising Against the Policies of Europe.

It almost seems as if the words of the deceased French statesman, Jules Simon, who died in June last, had in them the possibilities of a prophecy. Beware! he said, in substance, of the Mohammedans. "They see Europe overrunning Asia and Africa. The question with them is, 'To be or not to be?' The relations between the conquered Moslem peoples are being secretly revived. Everything in the east is asleep; nothing is dead. Be on your guard against the awakening." These words are brought to mind by the dispatch of the Herald's special correspondent in Constantinople, Mr. Sidney Whitman. It is a remarkable dispatch and is worthy of serious consideration by the peoples of Europe. The Moslem world is weary of domination and interference and senseless slaughter in the name of Christian civilization. Among the Softas, the leaders of thought in the Turkish Mohammedan world, the conviction gains ground, Mr. Whitman says, that the twilight of Moslem rule in Constantinople has come. "Remembering their warlike past, the Mohammedans have in despair resolved to light the funeral pyre. The English attacks on the sultan have increased their determination to face unflinchingly the worst." There is probably a great truth in these words, and if the torch of the fanatics is once lighted throughout the Moslem world who can tell the end? The Italians have been defeated and driven out of Abyssinia by the Negus, who is a Christian, but who had to make alliance with the dervishes in order to maintain his independence and his very existence. Now the English are pressing on to the sacred city of the dervishes in the Soudan, with the intention of wiping that stronghold of Moslemism out of existence. Will they or can they succeed? "Reflect," says Jules Simon, "that there are behind the dark curtain in Asia and Africa more than two or three civilizations of immense antiquity, ready to recognize and revive their ancient glories, and all the more formidable that after long resistance they have condescended to use the weapons acquired from us." Must we beware of the awakening of this sleeping fanaticism of the Moslem world?—New York World.

Pure Aluminum.

In 1855 a pound of aluminum cost $200. As late as 1890 it sold for [illegible] Nature has been lavish enough, in this instance, but man is slow to learn her secret. In its various compounds and it enters into the composition of a very large number of minerals—aluminum forms about one-twelfth of the crust of the earth. Ordinarily it is extracted from the oxide, alumina, which is the chief constituent of common clay. Until recently, however, only expensive processes have served to separate the metal from the combinations in which it is found. During the past two or three years American scientists and inventors have overcome many of the old obstacles. The first article ever made of the metal was—in compliment to Louis Napoleon, who had helped St. Clair Neville, the first manufacturer—a table for the baby Prince Imperial. At present it seems almost impossible to name a use to which the metal may not be put. Aluminum is lighter than glass, and only one-fourth as heavy as silver, which it somewhat resembles. Though it is as hard as zinc, scarcely any metal is equally malleable and ductile. It can be drawn into the finest wire and hammered into the thinnest sheets. Is sold at a low price aluminum, which does not tarnish, would largely supplant silver for decorating purposes. It is an excellent conductor, and might take the place of copper in electrical plants. Since no metal save steel of the highest grade is, weight for weight, its equal in strength, it would compete with the former in almost every manufacturing industry. France and Germany have built several torpedo boats of aluminum, finding that its lightness insures speed and that it resists corrosion and galvanic action better than any other metal. Yachts, rowboats, bicycles, horseless carriages, surgical instruments, skates, even cooking utensils have already been made from it.

Make Nuisances of Themselves.

There are some persons who are never satisfied unless making a noise. For them the bicycle is too silent a steed, and they have been endeavoring to find some method of racket-making while riding. The latest for the noise-loving rider is the big gong attached to the rear wheel, which clangs like a street-car gong and makes timid persons fear that they are about to be run down by a trolley car. This is only one form of nuisance. The other is a rubber band attachment to the frame of the wheel. The rubber bands are used for the reason that, when the wind is blowing and the rider is pedaling in its direction, the bands set up a humming sound that is really hideous. Several runaways have been caused by the buzzing of the rubber.

A Question of Sense.

"Why don't you want to take Freckles in as a partner?"

"Freckles was once engaged to my wife. Do you suppose I want a man in my business who is smarter than I?"—Fliegende Blaetter.

This Is a Mean Hint.

A Boston spinster was found dead in a public park with a revolver in one hand and a mirror in the other. The police are undecided as to which weapon was used.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IMPROVED.

The System Has Come to Stay but It Is Still Crude.

An expert points out that, while in the early days of electric lighting people thought much more of the mere fact of having electric light than of the actual efficiency they derived from it, the consumer of today is usually perfectly well able to tell whether he is getting full value in light for the money he is paying the central station, says the New York Times; so that between the strict exaction of the customer and the competition of rival lighting systems an electric light company can only hope to succeed by the best possible service. The whole subject of lighting is in a transition state. In factories and large shops the old practice of allowing the rays of the arc lamp to fall downward will probably soon be discarded. It is found that by inverting the lamp and throwing the light to the roof, which should be whitewashed or white painted, the powerfully reflected rays are so different throughout the building as to give the maximum efficiency without straining the eyes of the workmen. Much of the present outdoor lighting is condemned as crude and unscientific. The street arc lamps dazzle and strain the eye, throw sharp shadows and waste the light. The next improvement will probably be the use of lower candle power lamps, placed at shorter intervals and having reflecting hoods. The bottom half of the globes will be semi-opaque and possibly tinted a deep orange color. This would neutralize the painful glare of the arc lamp and give the streets the effect of being illuminated with Chinese lanterns. In domestic lighting shades having prismatic corrugations on their surfaces are coming into vogue. They give a good diffusion of light with but little absorption. An authority on decorative lighting says that although many new ideas have sprung up in the distribution of masses of light in interiors, none has yet superseded in beauty and effectiveness the system of putting lamps out of sight and lighting the room entirely by diffused and possibly colored light. This will probably be the method of illuminating churches in the future. In churches where it has already been adopted the effect is described as so infinitely restful and appropriate that in comparison the ordinary methods of church lighting seem garish and barbarous.

NAPOLEON'S WILL.

[illegible] half and this simple and [illegible] meaning in almost every line, says the October Century. His religion had been, at best, that of a deist; at the last he professed a piety which he never felt or practiced. During his life France had been loved and used as a skillful artificer uses his tools; the last words of his testament suggests a passionate devotion. To his son he recommended the "love of right, which alone can incite to the performance of great deeds;" for his faithless wife he expressed the tenderest sentiments and probably felt them. It was his hope that the English people would avenge themselves on the English oligarchy and that France would forgive the traitors who betrayed her—Marmont, Augereau, Talleyrand and Lafayette—as he forgave them. Louis he pardoned in the same spirit for the "libel published in 1820; it is full of falsehoods and falsified documents." The blame for Enghien's murder he took to himself. The second portion of the document is a series of munificent sounding bequests, disposing of his suppositious private fortune, estimated by him at 250,000,000 francs, to a list of legatees which includes every one who had done the legator any important service since his earliest childhood. In codicil he remembers one "Cautillon, who had undergone trial for an alleged attempt to assassinate Wellington. "Cautillon had as much right to assassinate that oligarch as he (Wellington) had to send me to the rock of St. Helena to perish there."

Longfellow's Handwriting.

Mr. W. D. Howells has been publishing in Harper's Magazine some interesting reminiscences of Longfellow, in the course of which he describes his handwriting as "smooth, regular, and scrupulously perfect." It was "quite vertical and rounded, with a slope neither to the right nor left, and at the time I knew him first he was fond of using a soft pencil on printing paper, though commonly he wrote with a quill. Each letter was distinct in shape, and between the verses was always the exact space of half-an-inch." Those acquainted with the so-called "vertical" writing, which is rapidly coming into vogue now, will notice that the above description exactly applies to it. Longfellow's manuscript, according to Howells, was quite perfect, but he admits that the poems he has in his possession were probably not first drafts.

Wayside Philosophizing.

Wayworn Watson—"Women is funny things. They say a woman's 'no' means 'yes' most of the time." Perry Patettic—"Mebbe it does, but when a bloke asks her for a handout while she is hangin' out clothes on a windy day an' she tells him 'no' he'll find out that it goes."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Bjornsen's Handwriting.

It is said that Bjornsen, the great Norwegian novelist, writes so illegibly that only his wife can decipher his manuscript. She copies all he writes, and after he has corrected it recopies it again till she sometimes writes the whole book over three or four times.

Boy's Gospel.

Little folks have ideas as well as larger folks. Little Fred Refner, an Auburn lad of eight years, came home from school yesterday noon, deeply interested in a question his teacher had given him. So he asked his mother about it. His teacher, Miss Gratz, had asked all her pupils to find out and tell her all they could about the "Life of Christ." The little fellow asked his mother to help him out. She told him to ask his teacher in which book of the New Testiment she wanted them to find it. So when he came home at night his face showed plainly that he had it clearly settled, and he exultingly called out, "Mamma, I can tell you where to find it now. It is in Claude Matthews." As Fred's people are all democrats, "the report was accepted, placed on file and marked O. K."

The New Hook Spoon Free to All.t

I read in the Christian Standard tha Miss A M. Fritz, Station A., St. Louis, Mo., would give an elegant plated hook spoon to anyone sending her ten 2-cent stamps. I sent for one and found it so useful that I showed it to my friends, and made $13,000 in two hours, taking orders for the spoon; it is a household necessity. It cannot slip into the dish or cooking vessel, being held in the place by a hook on the back. The spoon is something that housekeepers have needed ever since spoons were first invented. Anyone can get a sample spoon by sending ten 2-cent stamps to Miss Fritz. This is a splendid way to make money around home. Very truly,

tf JEANNETTE S.

True Spirit.

Ladies are the most earnest and active Christian in any community. We say this, as is often said, "without fear of successful contradiction." Had the men of the church been out at the Presbyterian prayer meeting last evening, they would have seen the proof also. Tee larger part of the attendance was of ladies, and one of them was so in earnest about getting there on time, that she came in with her kitchen apron on. So intent was she on performing her duties to the church and cause, that she would not have noticed this little change in church fashions had not her friends called attention to it. This is the kind of spirit our churches need more of. It is not so important that everything be in Sunday style. The bodily presence all church members is what our churches all need. And we are not afraid that any ministers in Auburn will rise up and dispute this. Give us more church members who are willing to come to services, even in workday clothes.

The Grandest Remedy.

Mr. R. B. Greene, merchant, of Chilhowie, Va., certifies that he had consumption, was given up to die, sought all medical treatment that money could procure tried all cough remedies he could hear of, but got no relief; spent many nights sitting up in a chair; was induced to try Dr. King's New Discovery, and was cured by use of two bottles. For past three years has been attending to business, and says Dr. King's New Discovery is the grandest remedy ever made, as it has done so much for him and others in his community. Dr. King's New Discovery is guaranteed for Coughs, Colds and Consumption. It don't fail. Trial bottles free at Robbins & McCord's drug store. 2

May Be Fun.

There is likely to be a pretty hot fight between C. W. Fairbanks and W. A. McKeen for the Indiana Senatorship. Both are very wealthy and both want it. Fairbanks furnished a good deal of money for the late campaign, and McKeen has been a liberal contributor many years, his party services dating back to the war. Harrison is his friend, and is not very favorable to Fairbanks. It looks now as if there would be much hard feelings and in case either gets it, Indiana will for the first time have a millionaire Senator.

You don't know where you got that cold. Do you know where you can get the cure for it? Every drug store keeps Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It cures coughs and colds.

Pingree's Opinion.

Mayor Pingree, of Detroit was elected governor of the state at the recent election. He recently was in New York City and was interviewed. He says he expects to be both gover, nor and mayor for a year. His term as governor begins next January, and his term as mayor does not expire until a year from next January.

"Nobody has asked me yet to resign as mayor," he said, "and there is no law in the state requiring me to resign. I guess I shall stay on. At any rate, I shall stay on as mayor until I have to get out. The potato argument was the chief one they used against me in the campaign. They told the farmers I was competing with them, and was hostile to the agricultural interests. Well, we did raise 62,000 bushels of potatoes on our Detroit farms this year. As governor, I am going right ahead with my reforms, and I think I shall be able to handle the legislature.

"The election? Oh, I am perfectly satisfied with that, except that it seems to have cost a great deal of money. I guess it would have been cheaper to build a Chinese wall around the silver mines. Hanna's an able man. I admire him for the way he ran the campaign. He seems to have been able to come on to New York, too, and make the trusts and monopolies do just what he said.

"Silver? I am for the double standard, and I don't care a damn who knows it. Sixteen to 1? Well, I don't know, I guess so; yes, 16 to 1."

Redistricting Ind.

The plans of republicans for redistricting the state for legislative purposes, are already being discussed. It will be remembered that in every campaign they talk about making a "fair apportionment." But everybody knows this is never done. The facts are, the present apportionment, though made to favor the democrats, is the fairest and most satisfactory for all concerned, that we ever had. It will be remembered, that the last legislature, tried to change the districts, and that as far as we in this part of the state are concerned, the change was more disliked by even republicans, than the present democratic districts, and they were glad when the supreme court killed the law. As we have often shown no law to redistrict for legislative purposes could be made by that legislature, but must be done by the one that meets this winter. The time for doing it legally, has come and the law to be enacted this winter will stand unless it is so bad that even the supreme court will go back on it, which is not likely. We expect of course, that the new law will favor republicans, and we might as well look for the most unfair gerrymander we ever had. Talk before election is one thing; work after election is altogether another.

Churning Done in One Minute.

I have tried the Lightning Churn, you recently described in your paper, and it is certainly a wonder. I can churn in less than one minute, and the butter is elegant, and you get considerably more butter than when you use a common churn. I took the agency for the churn here and every butter maker that sees it buys one. I have sold three dozen and they give the best of satisfaction. I know I can sell 100 in this township, as they churn so quickly, make so much more butter than common churns and are so cheap. Some one in every township can make two or three hundred dollars selling these churns. By addressing J F. Casey & Co, St. Louis, you can get circulars and full information so you can make big money right at home. I have made $80 the past two weeks and I have never sold anything in my life before.

1 A FARMER.

How the Dipper Saved the Farm.

Father was sick and the mortgage on the farm was coming due, I saw in the Christian Advocate where Miss A. M. Fritz, of Station A, St. Louis, Mo., would send a sample combination Dipper could be used as a fruit jar filler plain dipper a fine strainer; a funnel; a strainer funnel; a sick room warming pan, and a pint measure. These eight different uses makes the dipper such a necessary article that I went to work with it and it sells at very near every house. And in four months I paid off the mortgage. I can clear as much as $200 a month. If you need work you can do well by giving this a trial. Miss A. M. Fritz, Station A, St. Louis, Mo., will send you a sample for 18 two cent stamps—write at one. Beecher's Slave Sale

Thrilling Object Lesson on Slavery in Plymouth Pulpit.

Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher writes in the December Ladies' Home Journal of "When Mr. Beecher Sold Slaves in Plymouth Pulpit." and thus describes the sensation created by the sale of Sarah, which occurred on June 1, 1856:

"The solemn, impressive, silence of that vast Plymouth assemblage was absolutely painful as a young woman slowly ascended the stairs leading to the pulpit and sank into a chair by Mr. Beecher's side. Instantly assuming the look and manner of a slave auctioneer he called for bids. 'Look,' he exclaimed, at this marketable commodity—human flesh and blood, like yourselves. You see the white blood of her father in her regular features and high, thoughtful brow. Who bids? You will have to pay extra for that white blood, because it is supposed to give intelligence. Stand up, Sarah! Now look at her trim figure and her wavy hair!—how much do you bid for them? She is sound in wind and limb—I'll warrant her!' Who bids? Her feet and hands—hold them out, Sarah!—are small and finely formed. What do you bid for her? She is a Christian woman—I mean, a praying nigger—and that makes her more valuable, because it insures her docility and obedience to your wishes. 'Servants, obey your masters,' you know. Well, she believes in that doctrine. How much for her? Will you allow this praying woman to be sent back to Richmond to meet the fate for which her father sold her? If not, who bids? Who bids?'"

The congregation was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement; women grew hysterical, and men were greatly wrought up. Some one near the pulpit laid a banknote at Mr. Beecher's feet. Then the contribution baskets were passed and for half an hour money and jewelry were heaped into them. Women took off their bracelets, brooches and rings and put them in the baskets, and men unfastened their watches and handed them to the ushers. Mr. Beecher's voice, in the tone of an auctioneer, rang out, "In the name of Christ, men and women, how much do you bid?" The people were stirred beyond expression, and one of the congregation arose and said that whatever deficiency (in the price demanded for Sarah) there existed above the collection would be made up by several gentlemen, members of the church. "Then you are free, Sarah," cried Mr. Beecher turning to the girl beside him, and the audience broke into the wildest demonstration of enthusiastic applause, and quiet was not restored for several minutes. The collection left no deficiency. Instead, enough money to buy Sarah's freedom $1200, beside sufficient to purchase her a comfortable home, had been raised.

"South Before the War"

Harry Martell's big Southern production, the "South before the war," will be Manager Henry's attraction on Saturday Dec. 12.

This play is entirely different from anything of its kind, that has been produced. The combination of darkies (big and little) numbering fifty people. The performance embraces a great variety of music, camp meeting scenes, buck and wing dancing, superb singing by four quartettes with a chorus of forty voices, a genuine cake walk, which creates one continuous laughter, and a pickaninny band of seventeen little darkies. A carload of new scenery depicting a cotton field in full bloom, Frog Island, and the old Mississippi Steamboat Robert E. Lee, and several new ones that will be a surprise, by their true realism, and is a revelation in the art of stage craft, making the production the most realistic, and to those of the younger generation who have often heard what a plantation was in ante-bellum days, this play will give a very realistic idea.

There is also a parade on the day of the show leaving Opera house 11:30, and to miss it would be missing a treat.

Monday's Daily.

The Board met to-day in regular session and Mr. Gunsenhouser took his place on the board, Mr. Henderson retiring. Mr. Henderson has served the county faithfully and conscientiously for six years, and retires to private life with the high esteem of all who have sat on the board with him and of the people at large.

Among the first items of work that came up before them was the report by county attorney J. H. Rose, in regard to fees collected by Mr. Moody as county clerk, and which should have been turned over to the county. The amount is about $1400, and this shortage will have to be made good from such fees as may still be due to Mr. Moody, or else the bondmen will have to pay it. It consists of fines that should go to the school fund, jury fees, etc, etc. And some of it is fees that belong to the sheriff and perhaps to other officials. There seems to be an epidemic of trouble with public officers. It will result in a lesson to both office-seekers and voters. No man should take an office, unless he is competent and honest, and voters should refuse to support a man who lacks either of these qualifications.

Poor Politics.

R. M. Loockhart, writing from Waterloo for the Dispatch recently, advocated putting the name of candidate for congress on the national and state ballot instead of on the local ballot. He says had this been done at the recent election Mr. Leighty would have been elected. This conclusion, may or may not be true, and even if true, it is not necessarily the proper thing to do. A state ballot is printed at Indianapolis, and has the same names for the entire state. If the state printers had to change the name of candidate for congress as they finished the ballots for one district and started to print for another, there would be liable to be much confusion, and sometimes mistakes. But even if no errors were made the principle is wrong. Why should not the printing of congressional tickets be entrusted to the people in each congressional district? And why should not all possible rights and privileges be allowed to remain with the common people, or as near them as possible? The very reason given for putting the congressman on the state ticket is a wrong one and based on the desire to take from the individual voter, his intelligent choice of a candidate. Had Leighty's name been on the big ballot that contained the long national and state tickets he would have received more votes, so Mr. Lockhart believes. Possibly. But how? Simply by the voter disregarding of the names of congressional candidates in his eagerness to vote for state or national officers. In other words, Mr. Lockhart's idea seems to be to gathering in the unthinking votes, because they go as far as better ones, and it takes numbers to win success. An intelligent study of the two candidates by the voter, he does not deem desirable. But it is this very scrutiny by intelligent voters, that indicates the grade of citizenship and constitutes the success and safety of all free government There is a minor point in the article, that should not be omitted. He says, "The better element preferred Leighty." What arrogant nonsense! We are well acquainted with hundreds of voters, some of whom voted for Leighty and some for Robinson, and not even a mind reader could tell which set of voters, contained more of the "better element." Such talk is extremely shallow. For, if that "better element" wanted Leighty, may we not suppose they had sense enough to vote for him?

Stole Cracklins.

Some unknown parties entered the meat market of Leighty & McNabb at the south side last Saturday night and relieved them of a few cracklins from which the lard had been rendered. They gained an entrance by breaking open the back door with a sledge hammer. Nothing but the cracklins was stolen however.

Eventful Happenings in Every Known Hemisphere—Fires, Accidents, Crimes, Politics, Religion, Commerce and Crops, Sandwiched with Minor Affairs.

VENIZON SEIZED.

Minnesota's Game Warden Confiscates Thirty Tons.

A St. Paul (Minn.) telegram says: The State Game Warden has seized and declared confiscated to the State of Minnesota thirty tons of venison claimed as being illegally shipped to persons in Boston, New York and Chicago. The fines for the illegal transportation of game will probably be in the neighborhood of $40,000 to $50,000. Venison is now selling at 18 cents a pound, and it will be an easy matter for the State to dispose of the 60,000 pounds confiscated for $10,800. This is said to be the largest seizure ever made at one time in the United States.

Murder Mystery Solved.

Cincinnati special: The mystery of the killing of Thomas Joye early last Monday morning has been explained by a confession from James Welton, park policeman. He confessed to the Coroner that he and Joye were together at Muldoon's saloon and that both had been drinking. They became engaged in a scuffle over a revolver when it was accidentally discharged. This confession removes suspicion from Muldoon and Farrell who had been arrested charged with murder.

Shot Down by Bandits.

William E. Couts, 40 years old, a druggist and ex-Postmaster at Reelsville, nine miles west of Greencastle, Ind., was shot and killed by tramps. Couts and his clerk were just closing their general store when they were met at the door by two men, who ordered them to throw up their hands. The clerk did so and was robbed. Couts resisted and in the fight that followed was shot in the left eye. The robbers are still at large.

City Ice-Bound.

The city of Columbia, S. C., and the section of country for seventy-five miles south, east and west of it, is ice-bound. The streets present a picture of desolation. Thousands of beautiful shade trees are split, broken and prostrated, while hundreds of telephone, telegraph and electric light poles are down, with wires in an interminable tangle. The loss to the various companies in the city alone will aggregate $20,000.

A Town Destroyed.

Advices from Guayaquil, Ecuador, state that Ecuador has had another disastrous fire. Daule, an important town in the province of Los Rios, was the scene. More than than thirty houses in the business section of the town were destroyed by the flames. The loss will aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars. The origin of the fire is unknown.

'Twas a Romance.

Local detectives claim to have evidence that Michael Lascella, a refined looking foreigner, whose body was found in a field south of Toledo, Ohio, some months ago, was a Hungarian nobleman, who had been pursued by a relentless foe out of his native country and finally assassinated near Toledo. The detectives have the alleged murderer's name, they say, but won't disclose it.

Desperado Killed.

"Dynamite Dick," the notorious Territory outlaw, over whose head was a reward of $3 000, was shot and killed in a fight with a number of Deputy Sheriffs near Newkirk, O. T. Ben Craven, a member of Dick's band, and for whose arrest a reward of $300 is out, was badly wounded and captured. None of the officers were hurt.

The heaviest sentence ever imposed in the State, short of life, was given Saturday to William Day, at Butte, Mont., convicted of murder in the second degree. Judge Speer sentenced him to sixty years in the penitentiary. Day is now 20 years old.

ANTI-TOXINE FOR TYPHUS.

German Experimenters Make a Discovery of Value to Medical Science.

Commercial Agent Sawter reports to the State Department from Glauchau, Germany, on recent experiments by Prof. Pfeiffer and Kalle with "typhus-anti-toxine." If the hopes of the professors are realized medical science will receive a most valuable accession through their discoveries. The experimenters believe that typhus germs, like cholera germs, may be traced back to the existence in the blood of anti-typhoid substances. The typhoid bacillus is known to exist largely in well and spring water, and the fact that they are frequently the direct causes of infection is recognized by bacteriologists. Consequently the experiments, the report sets forth, tend to trace the existence of these germs, and, by locating them, preserving numberless lives. It is shown that between the ages of 20 and 25, persons are most prone to the development of the typhus germs. It is claimed that the "typhus anti-toxine" can easily and quickly be inoculated, proving of great benefit, especially in time of epidemic. The entire results of the experiments will soon be published for the benefit of the medical world.

STATE OF THE WOOL TRADE.

Market is Quiet, Yet the Sales Show a Marked Increase.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin's report of the wool market says: "The market is quiet, yet the sales show a marked increase. The sales are in large blocks and have been made by a few houses. A few of the biggest manufacturers have been in town, and they bought large blocks of Australian and territory wools, which they have stowed away for future use, believing that the market is going higher. Anything in the way of bargains in specially foreign wool has been quickly picked up. The sales of the week are 4,483,000 pounds domestic and 1,702,000 pounds foreign, against 2,984,100 pounds domestic and 987,000 pounds foreign last week and 2,215,500 pounds domestic and 614,000 pounds foreign for the same week last year. Sales to date show a decrease of 37,553,763 pounds domestic and 32,776,200 pounds foreign from the sales to same date in 1895. The receipts to date show a decrease of 143,449 bales of domestic and 42,487 bales of foreign."

MARKET FOR BICYCLES.

Germany Will Be a Good Field for American Manufacturers

Some valuable pointers for American bicycle makers who desire to introduce their machines into Germany are contained in a report to the State Department by United States Consul Tingley, at Brunswick, Germany. He predicts that the German market will next year grow to very large proportions, and by proper methods American manufacturers can secure a good share of it. They must, however, begin at once to perfect their plans, for the campaign will open very early next spring, and the next season will see in Germany as great enthusiasm for the sport as now exists in the United States. The Consul says the German wheels are heavy, clumsy and of poor material, but because their price is lower than that asked for the high-grade American wheels and because the latter are persistently misrepresented by the German merchants the Americans have been kept out of the market.

BOLD BREAK FOR LIBERTY.

Member of a Chain Gang Smashes His Fetters and Decamps.

Charles J. Taylor, of St. Louis, made a successful break for liberty Friday while working on the street in Clayton. Taylor was working about two blocks south of the court house with the rest of a gang. He had shackles on his legs. He picked up a hammer, and, laying his leg on a rock, he broke the irons from it, and then broke them from the other leg, thus giving him the freedom of both legs. He then picked up the broken shackles and started to run for the woods. Jacob Roth, who was guarding the gang, saw him start, and shot twice at the fleeing prisoner, but failed to stop him, though Roth claims that one load from the gun took effect. The noise of Roth's gun brought a crowd of men and boys to the place, and soon a large posse was in hot pursuit of the fleeing prisoner. They chased him for several hours, but failed to overtake him, as he had a good start on them, and took refuge in the woods.

UNDER AN ICE GORGE.

Many Wisconsin Towns in Terror of Annihilation by Flood.

Fearful disaster by flood threatened towns along the Chippewa River in Wisconsin. Millions of tons of ice and hundreds of thousands of logs had gorged above Chippewa Falls, and the use of dynamite to break it proved vain. Similar conditions prevailed at several points further down the river. Rumors are rife of great loss of life. At Chippewa Falls the alarm was so great that all the merchants in town abandoned their stores, moving stocks to remote places of safety. Residents held themselves ready to flee. Water filled all basements. All railroad traffic in the valley was suspended. Even under most favorable conditions from now on the ensuing damage will prove tremendous. Should the gorge break suddenly, the destruction would be beyond computation, for it would sweep down a populous and prosperous section, through many towns.

LOCKED IN TO DIE.

Chicago Mother Finds Her Four Babes Dead in a Suffocating Smoke.

Mary Bartovich locked her four children in her little two-room cottage at 1216 North 53d avenue, Chicago, Wednesday morning, and then left the house. When she returned two hours later the tiny building was filled with smoke and a fire that had licked up clothes and bedclothing in one corner had ended the lives of her little ones. She found them in a far corner of the house, lying side by side, each with a little bunch of cloth held tightly over mouth and nose. They had fought pluckily against the danger to the last. Their faces were as peaceful as if in happy slumber. The dead: Joseph, aged 6; Rosa, aged 4; John, aged 2; Louis, aged 1. The mother had been absent to gather coal scattered along the railroad tracks, and to overhaul the refuse at the dump for any articles which might yet be fit for food.

Perished in Flames.

By the burning of the passenger steamer City of Kalamazoo of the Williams Transportation Company in the river at South Haven, Mich., at an early hour Monday morning three lives were lost: Rosa Germs, colored, cabin maid; Joseph Lang, fireman on the United States steamer Michigan, who was temporarily acting as oiler on the Kalamazoo; Robert Van Ostrand, deck hand, of South Haven. The flames broke out amidships about 4 o'clock, and so rapidly did they spread over the steamer's upper works that the escape of the six members of the crew is deemed marvelous. The steamer Kalamazoo was built in South Haven four years ago at a cost of $48,000, increased by additions so it was valued at $50,000. On this there was an insurance of $25,000 held by twenty-five Eastern companies. The engine and boilers represent $15,000 of her cost and a portion of these may prove not entirely ruined. The hull is so charred that it may as well be pronounced a total loss, the upper works and cabin being entirely burned. The burned steamer had been plying between Grand Haven, Manistee and Milwaukee since leaving the run between Chicago and South Haven six weeks ago, but returned home for the winter last week. The cause of the fire is unknown.

NOT HOLDING OUR OWN.

Expenditures for the Month Were $8,050,024 More than Receipts.

The comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States shows that during November, 1895, the total receipts were $25,210,696 and the expenditures $32,260,720. The receipts for the five months of the fiscal year amount to $131,650,489 and the expenditures to $171,597,335. The deficit for the month of November, therefore, is $8,050,024, and for the five months $39,946,846, as compared with $15,869,337 for the corresponding five months of last year. The receipts from customs during November amounted to $9,930,385; from internal revenue, $13,104,828, and from miscellaneous sources, $2,175,482. This is a loss in customs, as compared with November, 1895, of $1,524,920, a gain from internal revenue of $64,744 and a gain of $684,379 from miscellaneous sources.

WILL FEED THE POOR.

Salvation Army Planning a Christmas Feast at St. Louis.

A tremendous Christmas feast, the like of which has never before been seen in St. Louis, will be given by the Salvation Army Christmas Day. Preparations are being made to feed 3,000 persons and the officers are now in search of a hall large enough to accommodate them. Besides those fed at the hall basket lunches will be prepared and everyone who presents a ticket that will be given them between now and Christmas will receive a basket of lunch. If a father or mother presents tickets for each member of the family they will be given lunches for all. All the churches in St. Louis will be visited by members of the army and asked to assist in this charitable undertaking. They will be asked to distribute tickets and to help in any other way possible.

CLEVELAND RUMOR DENIED.

President of Princeton Says Grover Will Not Be Made Dean of the Law School.

The fact that President Cleveland has purchased a house at Princeton, N. J., where he will make his home after the expiration of his term of office, has given rise to a rumor that he would become dean of the Princeton law school. President Patton, of the university, authoritatively denied this rumor. Said he: "There is absolutely no foundation for such a report. While we are all gratified to have the President and Mrs. Cleveland make their home in Princeton, their doing so has no university significance."

Sensations of a Suicide.

A man who registered as E. L. Bryan, but whose identity is unknown, sought a lodging place at the Kimball Hotel, Chicago, Saturday night. He was found dead Sunday afternoon amid circumstances that indicate he had planned and carried out most deliberate suicide. He wrote a letter to the coroner and the newspapers, another to the hotel proprietor, and a third to the medical men for the benefit of science, this while the drug he had swallowed was coursing through his arteries, destroying tissue and numbing the sense.

Fall of Angle Worms.

The sidewalks and streets in the central portion of Louisville, Ky., were covered with small angle worms early Friday morning. It is a commonly accepted belief that they fall during a rain shower. They were found on stone pavements, which could not have been the abode of so many worms. Another fact that bears out the cloud theory is that many of them were flattened out—not as if trampled on, but as if they had fallen from a great height.

Subscribers to the Project.

General Manager Holdridge, of the Burlington, announced that the road would contribute $30,000 toward the success of the trans-Mississippi exposition at Omaha, Neb. The amount subscribed by the Burlington is the full amount asked from that company by the exposition directory. The Burlington was asked for a heavier contribution than any other road entering the city.

Lawsuit Causes a Murder.

Horace L. Stearns, a wealthy and aged citizen of Perrysville, Ohio, was shot and instantly killed Sunday morning by Elias Keyster. The murder grew out of a lawsuit in which Keyster was defeated and in which Stearns acted as the attorney for the successful party.

Die in the Flames.

Two men were killed at a fire in Atlantic City, N. J., which destroyed $30,000 worth of property. Another man is missing, and is thought to be buried beneath the walls of the church, where the fire occurred.

Wage War Against Whisky.

The Kansas State Temperance Union is preparing to fight the proposition to resubmit the prohibitory amendment.

FEAR A GREAT FLOOD

DANGER AT CHIPPEWA FALLS, WISCONSIN.

Water Held Back by the Enormous Ice Gorge Threatens to Inundate the Whole Valley—Fitzsimmons Loses the Fight on a Foul.

Chippewa Falls' Disaster.

A calamity distressing in its results and in some respects unique is that which has befallen the people of Chippewa Falls, Wis., where an ice gorge forming in the river has dammed up the water, causing it to overflow and flood the surrounding territory. The extent of the disaster and the formidable nature of the elemental forces causing it may be conceived from the fact that within a very short time the river has risen to a height of twenty-four feet. There is danger of its changing its course and flowing into the town. As it is, the little place is flooded, buildings on certain streets being submerged to the second story. The inhabitants are getting away and carrying as much of their property with them as possible. Not only Chippewa Falls, but several adjacent towns, must suffer unless the gorge is broken within a very short time. Immense quantities of dynamite have been exploded with a view to breaking the gorge. It is reported that nearly 9,000 people are homeless, and the intense cold makes their situation worse.

At the time this is written the water is still rising, with little hope of breaking the gorge. The Chippewa River is twenty-eight feet above low-water mark. All places of business on Spring, River and Lower Bridge streets are vacated. One rumor to the effect that the river would cut out a passageway for itself through the high banks north of the Wisconsin Central Railroad bridge gave rise to great apprehension. The river's course is seriously obstructed by the gorge, that has reached within a short distance of the dam and the turning of the course of the stream upon the city seems so plausible that every one is panic-stricken.

THE ICE GORGE AT CHIPPEWA FALLS.

Scene from the wagon bridge looking toward the Chippewa Falls Lumber Company's mill.

The river presents a terrible appearance. The ice gorge is forty feet high, and backing water on the city at the rate of a foot an hour. Poor people are suffering terribly from the cold. The Wisconsin Central depot and tracks are under water. All business is done over the Northwestern line. The city is in complete darkness, as gas and electric light service are shut off by the water. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul has suspended its service through the Chippewa Valley, being unable to get a train through the flooded territory. Logs and limbs of trees are strewn many feet high on the track. On low grades the water rises many feet above the ties, and high enough to extinguish the engine fires.

An engine and coach that went out to the low lands below Durand came back with two score of women and children on board who were driven from their homes by the water and were found nearly dead from exposure and cold. The engineer said he could not finish the trip on account of the rising water. It looks at this writing as though the entire city will be inundated.

A great number of visitors are at the scene of the ice gorge. To realize the great danger it is only necessary to visit the banks of the Chippewa. It is a double-headed danger that is threatened. What means relief to Chippewa Falls will bring devastation to Eau Claire, Durand and other points below. The ice jam will likely remain intact, perhaps for months, and only natural causes can break it. The condition of affairs was considered at a business men's meeting in Eau Claire, but it was felt that no human agency could relieve the situation.

TREATED LIKE A WILD BEAST.

Insane Girl of Denver Chained to the Wall by Her Parents.

Bound to iron rings anchored in the walls and caged like a wild beast, Grace Solomon, the daughter of a wealthy pawnbroker of Denver, has raved for the past seven months in a condition and under surroundings the most terrible. Her condition is the result of investigation of spiritualism, it being charged that her mind was affected by spiritualistic demonstrations. She was taken to the little room and when she became violent was chained to the wall, where her condition became worse and where the most common wants of human kind were denied her. J. Solomon, her father, is one of the wealthiest men of the West, an old-time pawnbroker, who counts his cash by hundreds of thousands. The case is the most terrible ever brought to the attention of the Denver authorities.

Two railway laborers named Carey and Hopkins attempted to burn their way out of the Mena, Ark., jail and the fire got beyond their control and burned the building. Both men perished.

LOSES IT ON A FOUL.

Fitzsimmons Fails to Get the Decision Over Sharkey.

The fight between Robert Fitzsimmons and Thomas Sharkey in San Francisco proved one of the most sensational in the history of the ring. Sharkey was knocked down with a left crook on the jaw in the eighth round and was carried unconscious from the ring amid great excitement. Some confusion followed which the crowd did not understand.

FITZSIMMONS.

Fitzsimmons was trying to speak, but could not be heard. Then it was learned that Referee Wiley Earp had awarded the fight to Sharkey on a claim of foul. It was claimed that Fitzsimmons struck Sharkey in the groin with his knee as the latter was falling.

Fitzsimmons protested and the crowd hissed and groaned. In the eigth round Fitzsimmons soon had his man going and went at him ferociously. A right-hand swing staggered the sailor and then came a left-hand swing, and a left-arm punch under the chin that sent Sharkey over with a thud. While the marine was falling the referee claims that Fitzsimmons struck him in the groin with his knee, thus committing a foul. Sharkey was undoubtedly badly hurt. His seconds rushed into the ring and raised him up, but he fainted away and was borne from the ring unconscious. Hardly any one among the spectators saw the foul, and the decision was received with hisses and groans.

No event in the history of pugilism on the Pacific coast ever attracted so much public attention. Between 15,000 and 20,00 people ocupied all the available space in the big Mechanics' pavilion and watched the contest, which every one regarded as practically deciding the championship of the world. The long, lean New Zealander, who had had a succession of victories in the United States for the last five or six years, entered the ring with almost every apparent advantage in his favor. He could count upon his experience and science, his height and reach, and every other quality which enters into the making of the successful prize-fighter. Against him was the sailor lad, who was unknown six months ago but who rose to fame recently when he came perilously near trailing in the dust the colors of California's idol, James J Corbett.

BABES DIE IN SMOKE.

Chicago Woman Locks Her Little Ones in the Home and They Smother.

In Chicago Mary Bartovich locked her four babes in her hovel while she went to search for coal along the railroad tracks. It took her two hours to find 5 cents' worth. She was delayed longer than she expected, because the lumps were few and far between. The babies grew restless and, ransacking over the single living room, found a box of matches. They lit a candle which sat with tin dishes on the home-made table. They lit all the candles they could find in the house. The curtains caught fire. The bureau full of clothing burned. All the old coats and rags about the walls were fuel for the terrible tragedy which was being enacted. There was no air for a flame. The wood in the floor and the bare laths in the ceiling caught the spark. All the cracks in the side walls had been boarded for the winter. The coals smoldered and smoked. The whole inside became a furnace which needed only a breath of air to stir it until it should eat through the wood and give an alarm to the neighborhood.

The mother, knowing the value of coal picked lump by lump in a sack, had provided that no breath of air should get in during her absence. The provision was deadly. The babies raced about the room until all the crude furniture was overturned. They then rushed into the little box hall and huddled in the corner. They each had a rag held tight over the mouth. They were found dead side by side, the rags still covering the faces as witnesses of the desperate thoughtfulness of the eldest—Joseph—barely in his sixth year. The mother returned home about noon and was almost crazed at the discovery of her little ones dead.

PERISH IN THE BLIZZARD.

Reports of Suffering and Death from North Dakota.

It is a week since a train arrived in Langdon, N. D. The storm was excessively severe in that section, and the temperature dropped to 30 degrees below zero. Three persons are known to have lost their lives and several others are missing. Mrs. Mikelson was frozen to death in her house and a man and his wife succumbed to the cold while fleeing from the fire. From Emmons County a pitiful case of suffering and death is reported. A Russian family named Belovitzy used all their firewood in the storm and had torn down and burned a part of the house. This let in the intense cold, and the whole family—father, mother and three children—were found frozen to death. There is a wood and coal famine in that section, the farmers having bought sparingly because of high prices. Mail Agent Burroughs was buried in the drifts three miles west of Devil's Lake.

The body of William E. Herron, sheriff of Plymouth County, was found frozen stiff and badly bruised by the side of the railroad track near Merrill, Iowa. Half a dozen steamers are said to be bound tight in the ice along the north shore of Lake Superior, and it will be impossible to release them. A snowstorm of almost unprecedented severity for this season of the year broke upon Atlanta, Ga., Wednesday morning. Snow began falling at 6 o'clock and fell without cessation until 11, when it lay four inches deep.

FINANCES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Statement of the Public Debt and Other Fiscal Matters of Interest.

The statement of the public debt, issued Tuesday, shows that on Nov. 30, the debt, less cash in the treasury, amounted to $995,709,159, an increase for the month of $8,270,203. This increase is accounted for by the corresponding decrease in the amount of cash on hand. The debt is recapitulated as follows:

Interest-bearing debt, $847,364,520.

Debt on which interest has ceased since maturity, $1,591,620.

Debt bearing no interest, $372,170,117.

Total, $1,221,126,257.

This does not include $567,523,923 in certificates and treasury notes outstanding, which are offset by an equal amount of cash in the treasury. The cash in the treasury is recapitulated as follows, cents omitted:

Gold, $169,527,101.

Silver, $509,680,450.

Paper, $129,616,155.

Bonds, disbursing officers, balances, etc., $17,137,872.

Total, $835,961,529, against which there are demand liabilities amounting to $610,504,481, which leaves a cash balance in the treasury of $225,357,098.

The comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States shows that during November, 1896, the total receipts were $25,210,696, and the expenditures $32,260,720. The receipts for the five months of the fiscal year amount to $131,650,489, and the expenditures $171,597,335. The deficit for the month of November, therefore, is $7,050,024, and for the five months $39,946,846, as compared with $15,869,337 for the corresponding five months of last year.

The receipts from customs during November amounted to $9,930,385; from internal revenue, $13,104,828, and from miscellaneous soruces, $2,175,482. This is a loss in customs, as compared with November, 1895, of $1,524,929; a gain from internal revenue of $64,744, and a gain of $684,379 from iscellaneous sources.

The monthly statement of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that on Nov. 30 the amount of national bank notes in circulation was $235,312,103, an increase for the month of $414,446, and for the last twelve months of $21,440,907. The amount of circulation based on United States bonds was $216,609,684, an increase for the month of $99,470, and for the last twelve months of $26,140,158. The amount of circulation secured by lawful money was $18,702,410, an increase for the month of $314,776, and a decrease for the last twelve months of $4,699,351. The amount of United States registered bonds on deposit to secure circulating notes was $241,272,150, and to secure public deposits $15,903,000.

The statement of the director of the mint shows that during the month of November, 1896, the total coinage at the mints of the United States was $7,458,722, of which $5,064,700 was gold, $2,305,022 silver and $89,000 minor coins. The coinage of standard silver dollars during the month was $1,914,000.

WILD BEASTS GROW BOLD.

They Are Troublesome to the Wisconsin Lumber Camps.

The lumber camps in Northern Wisconsin are considerably annoyed this winter by the depredations of wild animals, more particularly the wildcat and the lynx. It has come to be impossible to leave a shoulder of beef outside the cook shanty over night without its being attacked by the fierce animals which have become so numerous that the woodsmen furnish ammunition to any man who wants to take a gun and wait for the appearance of the brutes. There is a bounty for the delivery of scalps of the lynx, wildcat and wolf in the State, and it is expected that there will be many claimants for it this winter. The wolves and wildcats are much more numerous than they have been for years past and have encroached upon the limits of civilization. Timber wolves are frequently seen on the outskirts of South Superior. A settler from Lyman Lake, Gustave Peterson by name, reports that the pests are unusually numerous in that vicinity. Peterson brought to town with him a big wildcat, which weighed thirty-five pounds, and two lynxes of the "booted" variety, the larger breed. Peterson shot the wild cat about a week ago. One night after he had turned in there was a hurried knock at his door and a much frightened lumber camp hand told him that he had been visiting a neighboring camp, and on the way back had been followed by a couple of wild cats. The man was in considerable fright, but Peterson took down his rifle and went out. He saw a glaring pair of eyes and fired, bringing down his game. The other animal got away. The next night Peterson shot the lynxes, which were prowling about the clearing. The wild cat was of unusual size. It is very seldom that they will follow man, but it is reported from the more remote districts that the lumber jacks will not venture out in the woods after night unarmed.

HORSELESS MAIL WAGONS.

Postoffice Department Will Experiment with Them in New York City.

A scheme to use horseless mail wagons in New York City has been proposed by Second Assistant Postmaster General Neilson. One of the vehicles is in the course of construction, and the experiment will be tried soon. If the horseless wagons should prove to be a success mail taken from the street boxes and sorted during the collection from box to box at the end of the trip can be taken direct to postal cars. This change would relieve the pressure at the branch stations and the general postoffice.

CHAPTER XV.

It was after 11 o'clock, and John Timmons had not yet emerged from his cellar. All the while he had been below a strong, pungent smell of burning, the dry, sulphurous smell of burning coke, had ascended from below, with now and then noise of a hand-bellows blowing a fire, but no steam or sound or savor of cooking. Now and again there was the noise of stirring a fire, and now and again the noise of tongs gripping and loosing and slipping on what a listener might take to be pieces of coke.

If no one was listening to the stoker some one was watching the exterior of the marine store. A short time before 11 o'clock a man dressed in seedy black cloth, with short iron-gray whiskers and beard, and long iron-gray hair and wearing blue spectacles, turned into the street, and sat down in a crouching position on the axle-tree of a cart.

When it was about a quarter past 11 Timmons emerged from the cellar, carrying in one hand a dark lantern, with the slide closed. He went cautiously to the wicket, and with a trowel began digging up the earth of the floor, which was here dark and dry. It was old sand from a foundry, and could be moved and replaced without showing the least trace of disturbance.

After digging down about a foot he came upon a small, old bag, which he lifted out, and which contained something heavy. The bag had been all rubbed over with grease and to the grease the dark sand stuck thickly. Out of this bag he took a small, heavy, cylindrical bundle of chamois leather. Then he restored the bag to the hole, shoveled back the sand and smoothed the floor.

Timmons walked softly over his noiseless floor until he got behind the old boiler of a donkey engine. Here he slid back the slide of the lantern and unrolled the leather. The latter proved to be a belt about a palm deep, and consisting of little bags or pockets of chamois leather, clumsily sewn to a band.

There were a dozen of those little pockets in all; six of them contained some heavy substance. Each one closed with a piece of string tied at the mouth. Timmons undid one and rolled out on his hand a thick lump of yellow metal about the size of the large buttons worn as ornaments on the coats of coachmen.

He smiled a well-satisfied smile at the gold ingot, and weighed it affectionately in his grimy palm, gave the ingot a loving polish with his sleeve, dropped it back into its bag, and retied the string. Then out of each of his trousers' pockets he took a similar ingot or button, weighed each, and looked at each with affectionate approval, and secured each in one of the half-dozen vacant leather bags.

"Two pounds two ounces all together," he whispered. "I have never been able to get more than four dollars an ounce for it, taking it all round at fifteen carats. His offer is as good as ten dollars an ounce, which leaves a margin for a man to get a living out of it, if the dwarf is safe. If I had had only one deal with him, I'd feel he's safe, but he has done little but talk grandly and vaguely up to this. Well, after this deal to-night he can't draw back or betray me. That's certain, anyhow."

He unbuttoned his waistcoat, strapped the belt round his lank, hollow waist, blew out the lantern and stepped into the deserted street. Before he disappeared, the elderly man with grizzled hair and whiskers, dressed in seedy black cloth, emerged from the shadow of the cart and kept stealthily in the rear of the marine store dealer. Timmons was on his way to keep his appointment with Leigh in Chetwynd street, and the low-sized man with blue spectacles was following, shadowing Timmons.

Oscar Leigh sat in the dark on the last step but one of the stairs of his house, awaiting the arrival of Timmons. It was close to the appointed hour. He had one of his knees drawn up close to his body, his elbow rested on his knee, his long bearded chin in the palm of his hand. It was pitch dark. Nothing could be seen, absolutely nothing.

"My mother cannot live forever," whispered the dwarf, "and then all will be blank, all will be dark as this place round me. Where shall I turn then? Whom shall I speak my heart to? I designed my clock to be a companion, a friend, a confidant, a solace, a triumph; it is becoming a tyrant and a scourge. A man must have something to think of besides himself; a deformed dwarf must never think of himself at all, unless he thinks great things of himself. Here's Timmons."

Leigh rose, and sliding his left foot and supporting his body on the stick, went to the door and opened it.

"Twelve to the minute," said Timmons.

"Let us go for a walk," said Leigh.

"But I have the stuff with me," said Timmons, in a tone of annoyance and protest.

"Let us go for a walk, I say," cried Leigh, imperiously, striking his thick twisted stick fiercely on the flags as he spoke.

The two men turned to the left, and went on a few paces in silence.

"I have been in telegraphic communication with Milwaukee since I saw you," said Leigh. "I had not only a message, but several messages."

"Ay," said Timmons, scornfully, with an impatient serpentine movement running up his body and almost shaking his head off its long, stork-like neck. "Well, is the fool off the job?" asked he coarsely, savagely, in slang, with a view to showing how cheap he held such unprincipled circumlocution.

The dwarf stopped and looked up with blank amazement on his face and an ugly flash in his eyes. "Is what fool off the job, Mr. Timmons? Am I to understand that you are tired of these delays?"

"Look here, Mr. Leigh. I've come on business. What have you to say to me? I have twenty-six ounces that will average fifteen carats. Are you going to act square and stump up?"

"Hah! I see," said Leigh, smiling blandly. "I own I am relieved. The fact, my dear sir, is, that on leaving you I telegraphed to my correspondent in Milwaukee for——"

"What are you going to do? That's what I want to know," said the other fiercely.

"Precisely. Well, sir, I shall tell you my position in two words. I suspect my correspondent of not having much money."

"And you think this villain might cheat, might swindle us after all our trouble?"

"I think this villain capable of trying to get the best of us, in the way of not paying promptly or the full price agreed upon, or perhaps not being able to pay at all."

"Mr. Leigh, I hope, sir, you'll forgive my hot words of a while ago. I know I have a bad temper. I humbly ask your pardon." Timmons was quite humble now.

"Certainly, freely. We are to work, as you suggested, on the co-operative principle. If through my haste or inefficiency the money had been lost, we should all be the poorer. Now you understand why I did not ask you into my place and take the alloy. We must wait a little yet. We must wait until I can light upon an honest man to work up the result of our great chemical discovery. I hope by this day week to be able to give you good and final news. In the meantime the ore is safe with you."

"I'm sure I'm truly grateful to you, sir."

"Give me a week. This day week at the same hour and at the same place."

"Very good. I shall be there."

CHAPTER XVI.

When Edith Grace came into the little sitting room in Grimsby street the morning after her flight from Eltham House she found her grandmother had not yet appeared. She went to Mrs. Grace's door and asked if she might bring the old woman her breakfast. To her question she received a blithe answer that Mrs. Grace would be ready in a minute. The girl came back to the room where the breakfast was laid and sat down to wait. She was standing at the window absorbed in thought, when Mrs. Grace came into the room and took the girl in her arms before Edith was aware of her presence.

"Thank heaven, you are here once more, my darling. To see you makes even this place look like home. Oh, what a miserable time it was to me while my child was away. It seemed an age. Short as it was, it seemed an age, darling. Of one thing, Edy, I am quite certain, that no matter what is to become of us, we shall never be separated again, never, darling, never. That is, if you are not too proud or too nice to be satisfied with what will satisfy your old grandmother."

The girl sobbed her long-pent torrent of chaotic feeling away, the old woman stroking softly the dark glossy hair with one hand and pressing the head to her bosom with the other.

In a little while Edith recovered her composure, and stealing out of her grandmother's arms, turned towards the window to conceal her red and tear-stained face. The old woman went and busied herself at the table.

"Edy," she said, "here is a letter. I have not my glasses with me. Will you read it to me, dear?"

The girl turned round, took the letter and went back to the window—for a better light.

"It is signed Bernard Coutch," said the girl in a low voice.

"Well, go on, child. Let us hear what this Mr. Coutch has to say. Breakfast must wait. Nothing grows cold in such lovely weather. I hope this Mr. Coutch has good news."

"Dear Madam—Mr. James Burrows, solicitor, of Lincoln's Inn, wrote me a few days ago, with a view to ascertaining some facts regarding the Graces of Gracedien——"

"Wait a minute, Edith." The old woman rose excitedly and came to the window. "I must tell you, dear, that when first Mr. Burrows wrote me to say the bank had failed, and that your money and mine were gone, I went to him, as you know, and got no hope of ever saving anything out of the bank. But I did not tell you then, for I was ashamed of being so weak as to mention the matter to Mr. Burrows, that I told him all I knew of the history of the Graces of Gracedieu, and of the old story of mysterious money going to the runaway Kate Grace fifty years ago. I asked him to make what inquiry he could, and let me know any news he might pick up. I was foolish enough to imagine, dear, that something might come to you out of the property of the rich Graces if we only knew where they are, if there are any. Now go on, dear."

Edith recommenced the letter:

"Dear Madam—Mr. James Burrows, solicitor, of Lincoln's Inn, wrote me a few weeks ago, with a view to ascertaining some facts regarding the Graces of Gracedieu, near this place.

"I regret to say that I have not been able to find out much. Gracedieu is a small residence about a couple of miles from this. Early in the century the Graces lived in this town. The family were in comfortable circumstances, and one of the daughters, a lady of great beauty, disappeared and was, so the story goes, never afterwards heard of here. It was rumored she married a very handsome and rich young foreign nobleman who had been on a visit in the neighborhood.

"Some years after the disappearance of the young lady, Mr. Grace seemed to come suddenly into a large amount of money; bought a few acres of land, built a house and called his place Gracedieu. From the name of the house it was assumed the gentleman the young Miss Grace had married was a French nobleman. Later the Graces left. Absolutely nothing else is known of them in this neighborhood, and even this much would not be remembered only for the romantic disappearance of Miss Kate Grace, the rumor she was married, and the sudden influx of wealth upon the family.

"Yours faithfully,

"BERNARD COUTCH."

The girl turned away from the window, dropped the letter to the floor, and said in a listless voice, looking, with eyes that did not see external things, at the old woman, "Mother, you ought to be glad you are not one of the family of Grace."

"Why, child, why?"

"We are an accursed race."

"My child! my child, what folly you talk. There is no disgrace in marriage, no disgrace in this. There was no shame in this, and who knows but the mysterious man who ran away with the beautiful Kate long ago, and married her, may now be a great man in France? He was a nobleman then and honors are things that grow, dear. If we could only find out the title he had. I suppose we could if we tried."

(To be continued.)

ADVERTISES HIS INJURY.

A Kansas Farmer Bound to "Get Hunk" with the Railroad.

Farmer Jake Stoddard, of Doniphan County, believes in telling the world of his grievance. He has been wronged and he is determined that all who whirl by his house on the Burlington road shall know all about it. Uncle Jake's troubles are told by a sign board which stands near his house by the side of the railroad tracks. The passenger on the Burlington, if he is a lover of the romantic scenery which abounds in northwestern Kansas, may observe from the car window as the train from Atchison approaches Fanning station a large sign covering a board one by five feet, nailed to a pole twelve feet high, which reads:

THIS MAN HAS BEEN WRONGED BY THE RAILROADS.

When the road was built it suited the convenience of the company, according to a local correspondent, to lay the track within ten feet of the corner of Farmer Stoddard's house. The construction gang plowed through his barnyard, removed his hen house and cut a wide swath through a fine young orchard which was the pride of Farmer Stoddard's heart. The agriculturist fixed his damages at a high figure; so high, in fact, that the company compelled him to go into court and take what he regarded a ridiculous sum.

It was not long until the trains were running. When the first excursion steamed out of Atchison the passengers, when the train reached Farmer Stoddard's place, observed the sign in bold, black letters, with a background as white as snow. Stoddard had painted the sign himself, and, while it was not executed in the highest style of the art, it could be distinctly read.

Farmer Stoddard has raised a large family of boys and he has taught them to hate corporations. Not less than a half dozen dogs of doubtful breed can always be found on the Stoddard place. The dogs, too, are taught to hate the railroad, and when a train passes the entire pack runs out and barks at it. The old farmer feels that he is in a measure getting even. Brakemen on freight trains have great sport throwing pieces of coal at the dogs as the train passes. Stoddard figures that he gathers up almost enough coal around his premises to keep one stove running through the winter months.

Hard Luck.

"I was going along a mountain road in West Virginia," said a timber buyer to a Star reporter. "I had been in the same section a year previous and had stopped at the cabin of a man named Turner, where I had been well treated. I concluded to trespass upon his hospitality again and reached the place about sundown. He was sitting on the step playing a violin.

"'Hello, Turner,' I called.

"'Howdy.'

"'Can I stay all night?'

"'Reckon not this time. I'm 'lone.'

"'Where are the folks?'

"'Waal, sence yo' war hyar I played in ha'dest luck yo' ever seed. Went ter dig a well an' went through inter a cave. I wanted a cellar anyhow, so I jess got down an' splored that air cave. It opened down by the crick, an' I seed b'ar tracks. I wanted th' cellar wuss than I did th' b'ar, so I went ter town an' got pizen. Then I baited the cave an' went huntin'. While I war gone my boy seed th' b'ar lyin' down an' shot 'im, not knowin' he war pizened. Folks ate 'im an' when I got back with ten turkeys an' a heap o' squirrels thar wa'n't no one; folks war jess startin' with th' funerals, not knowin' when ter look fer me.'

"'I am very sorry to hear of your trouble,' I said.

"'Yaas, it set me back right smart, but ef yo' come by this way next week I'll be all right agin an' yo' kin stop. I'm gwine ter marry th' Widder Logan an' her three children termorrer. I'm gwine ter see th' squar' ternight, else I'd let yo' stop now.'"

Those Cigars.

It was the dead of night. Darkness so thick that the street lamps made but a glimmer in it and enveloped all the city. Suddenly Mrs. Tomanjerry, the wife of the genial and widely known South Side saloon keeper, woke with a start from a sound sleep. Silently she pushed the bedclothes away from her face and rose to a sitting posture. She listened intently. It was but too true, there was a burglar in the house. She could hear his footsteps as he stealthily crossed the floor of the bar room below. She placed one hand over Mr. Tomanjerry's face so that he could not cry out and jabbed him in the ribs with her elbow. Mr. Tomanjerry awoke hurriedly.

"John," she said, softly, "there's a burglar in the place."

"Nit," said Mr. Tomanjerry, briefly. "It's pipe dreams you're havin'."

"I heard him cross the floor."

"You heard nothin'. Leave me sleep."

Mrs. Tomanjerry listened again.

"He's there, John," she said, in a whisper. "I heard him scratch a match. He's lighting one of your cigars. I heard him set the box down."

Mr. Tomanjerry sat up and listened with her.

"Dat's right," he said, after a moment. "Dere's some one dere. Did you hear him light a cigar?"

"Yes."

"One of dose off de bar?"

"Yes."

"Well, leave him be. We'll find him in de mornin'."—Chicago Tribune.

WOMAN'S REALM

GOTHAM SOCIETY QUEEN.

MRS. WILLIAM C. WHITNEY will soon succeed to the vacant throne of queen of Gotham's society. Such at least seems to be the understanding among those who are familiar with fashionable intelligence. Since the decline and fall of Mrs. William Astor Gotham society has been queenless. It was thought for a time that young Mrs. John Jacob Astor would be elevated, but the fact that she is a Philadelphian ruined her hopes. Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, recently Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, aspired and was crushed. She will live abroad hereafter. Mrs. Cornelius Vondervilt cannot assume the headship of the butterflies on account of her husband's illness. Mr. Whitney's new wife is just the lady for the crown. She is 36, entrancingly beautiful, and as the wife of Captain Randolph had entree to the very best drawing rooms of aristocratic England. She is eminently fitted for leader of the smart set by reason of her wealth, family and experience. As mistress of the big Whitney mansion at the corner of Fifth avenue and Fifty-seventh street she will be brilliant.

MRS. WILLIAM C. WHITNEY.

Place to Keep a Bicycle.

An ingenious English woman has designed a cabinet for the bicycle in the form of a hall table and hatstand. This cabinet can be made of any wood and finished to suit any style or color. The sunken panels are filled in with Japanese leather paper, both in the doors and on each side of the mirror back. All the ordinary requirements of the entrance hall are supplied, but naturally the interior required a good deal of skilful arrangement to afford the greatest amount of accommodation with the least possible space. The flap in the cabinet above the opening doors is hinged, to throw back, so that the bicycle can go in without any alteration of the handle bars. Then the floor is fitted with grooves and draws out altogether, to be used as a "home trainer," while in its proper place in the cabinet it serves to keep the bicycle in position. There is plenty of room inside for all the bicycle belongings, as well as the cleaning apparatus.

CABINET FOR BICYCLE.

Chop Wood for a Husband.

There was a novel wood-cutting contest in the Seventh Ward of Williamsport, Pa., the other day, in which five young women took part. The girls are all employed in the Lycoming rubber factory, and, having a holiday, they turned their time to good account, besides settling a much-disputed question as to which was the most entitled to a husband. The girls are Bess Mayers, Flora Mahl, Lillie Mahl, Lillie Dunlap, Belle Gouldy and Mary Russell, all pretty, vivacious young women, who earn their own living and make good wages in the rubber factory. In a banter the other day one of the girls proposed that they have a wood-chopping contest, and the one who proved herself to be the champion cutter should be entitled to a husband, while the others, it was agreed, must wait two years before joining fortunes with her best beau.

The girls, each with a brand-new ax, bedecked with red, white and blue ribbons, marched into the back yard of Widow Hartman's home and made an assault on the woodpile. Widow Hartman is a helpless invalid, she having fallen and hurt herself quite badly last winter. Her daughter Lou works in the rubber factory, too, and she was one of the movers in the wood-cutting scheme, although she took no part in the contest.

Five loads of hemlock slab wood, cut to stove lengths, had been delivered at Widow Hartman's place the day before —the girls paying for it—so there was plenty of material for them on which to test their strength and skill. But the way the ribboned axes flew and tongues wagged was only equaled by the shower of split sticks that gradually piled themselves up around each chopping-block. William Baskins and Joseph Schell were there as referees. One of the young men, however, had a more direct interest in the contest than being judge, for one of the girls was his sweetheart, and, according to the compact, if she proved one of the losers in the contest he would be compelled to wait two long years before she could become his wife. For four hours the wood-chopping went on; the girls got red in the face; they rolled up their sleeves until their plump, pink arms were bared almost to the shoulders, and whacked away at the hemlock blocks as though their lives instead of a husband depended upon it.

Finally 12 o'clock came, and at the end of that time there were five weary, perspiring girls and five big piles of nicely split hemlock wood for Widow Hartman. But for the life of them the referees could not decide between the piles of wood cut by Miss Dunlap and Miss Russell as to which was the larger. And, indeed, after raking over all the sticks and counting them separately, the discovery was made that the two girls had cut exactly alike. The contest was declared a draw. And now all the marriageable young men of the seventh ward are casting their eyes with favor in the direction of these fair young women who so gallantly demonstrated their ability to cut firewood.

Danger in Mock Marriages.

Not a few giddy girls think it is a huge joke to participate in a mock marriage, yet such events have often led to serious embarrassments. Marriage is a matter too serious to be trifled with. Judges in the courts have frequently been called upon to dissolve the ties thus thoughtlessly entered into, sometimes, it is sad to relate, with the connivance of ministers of the gospel and magistrates who ought to know better than to play the part they do in these affairs. If a clergyman were to announce that a baptizing pool would be opened some evening, either in the church or elsewhere, and that he would perform the rite of baptism as a public entertainment on the fattest woman or the tallest man in the neighborhood, there would be no more sacrilege than there is in a mock wedding gotten up for a public show.

How to Keep Wrinkles Away.

A simple preventive against the appearance of wrinkles is this: Saturate a soft towel in very hot water, wring it and apply it to the face, keeping it there for at least twenty minutes. Then dry the face very gently. This must be done just before going to bed. When traveling, if the skin is very sensitive, do not bathe the face except at night and in the morning, and then throw a few drops of tincture of benzoni into the water, so that it may be made soft and agreeable to the skin.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Waistcoats for Fair Wearers.

Pretty serviceable vest fronts are made of gay plaid silks or striped velvets. These are finished with the full pouf, which is held in place by small enameled buttons.

For morning shopping excursion nothing is smarter than the bright little scarlet waistcoat of smooth cloth, buttoned high to the throat with dull gold or old silver buttons.

Lace and chiffon figure largely in vest fronts, and alternate bands of lace insertion and tucked chiffon with tiny bands of sable covering the seams make charming little vests.

Any sort of excessive decoration is not considered too much for the little vest, which seems to be a necessary part of every gown, whether it is made with or without a jacket.

For evening wear nothing is more effective than the very full vest fronts of white chiffon which may be arranged in a sort of billowy jabot and worn with a velvet stock, the color of an American beauty rose.

NOTES ABOUT SCHOOLS AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

Plea for a Parent Day in the Public Schools—Have Patience with the Dull Pupil—Schoolma'am and a Mouse—Backwardness in England.

Parent Day.

A nation can be no greater, no purer, no safer than is the life of the individual of that nation, great, pure and safe. It is to be hoped that the teachers and parents of this republic will co-operate to secure such teaching as will surely result in great good to the nation and upon which very largely the perpetuity of the republic depends.

Twenty-two million children and youth of school age in our nation ought to compel the most thoughtful attention of all the adults to the present and imperative demand for the earnest co-operation of parents, school officers, teachers and citizens to employ and perfect all methods and efforts that are necessary to secure the very best results for the education of these twenty-two million coming citizens and parents. The coming together of parents, children, officers and teachers in the schools on a given day which shall be devoted to exercises in honor and praise of the home and family, and the inculcation of personal virtues, seems to me eminently fitting.

This day should be made one of the few most important days of the year. We celebrate the Fourth of July because it calls to memory the struggle for national independence. We celebrate Washington's birthday because he was an ideal citizen. We celebrate Arbor Day because we want to teach the children to love nature. Let us celebrate Parents' Day in the school to teach the children that before the individual, before the school, before the State, stands in holiness and admiration, the home and the family; to teach every child that with his laudable ambition to be an excellent pupil, while he should know that it is necessary for his own good and the good of the State that he is a law-abiding, public-spirited citizen, he should also know that the highest and holiest obligations will rest upon him as a unit of the home and in social and family relations. Exercises appropriate should be prepared by the teacher. Send special invitations to all patrons, whether they have children in school or not. Select songs, recitations, essays, dialogues bearing upon home life, its beauties and duties, the child in the home, the mother, the father and the family.

Over and over the question is asked, "How shall be teach civil government to our younger pupils?" Government has its foundation in the home. Loving obedience there establishes habits of obedience to civil authority any and everywhere. Here is a golden opportunity for impressive lessons in civil government.

A Parents' Day without parents would be an object lesson without the object. Let parents, if necessary, sacrifice something to be in attendance upon the exercises. Let these exercises be held in the afternoon or evening, as will convenience parents.

Backwardness in England.

Prof. Sylvanus Thompson gives one striking instance of the backwardness of England in its provision for specialized technical instruction. It is a matter-of-course knowledge that electricity plays every day a larger part in chemical manufacture. Recognizing this new development Germany has lately erected at three of its universities large electro-chemical laboratories and endowed special professorships in addition to the chair which has for some years existed at Frankfort. Against these England has nothing to show but two small electro-chemical laboratories—one at the Technical College, Finsbury, and one of the Birmingham Municipal Technical School—and both of these devoted to instruction in electroplating and electro-typing rather than to research in electro-chemistry. "As for the rest of the science colleges in England, they are too busy with preparing pupils to pass examinations, or are too poor, to be able to undertake any such new departure."—London (Eng.) Journal of Education.

Protest Is Made.

The overseers of Harvard College have received a protest against the plan suggested by the committee on English composition and rhetoric, "to publish the papers of all the candidates presenting themselves for admission to college from some one or two particular schools or academies, the Boston Latin School, for instance, and Mr. Nobles, or Messrs. Browne & Nichols, and the Roxbury Latin, thus at once bringing into contrast the methods pursued and results achieved in those schools." This protest is signed by the principals of the schools named, who contend that "such comparison would establish a dangerous precedent and is a new departure for Harvard College, which has been scrupulously careful in the past to treat all fitting schools alike"; and that "sight translations from Latin, Greek, German or French made in a limited time under a great nervous strain are not evidence of a candidate's general ability or inability to write good English."

Dull Pupils.

In every school there are a few pupils whose eyes have still the vacant stare, after nearly all have grasped the principle the teacher wishes to explain. The teacher should make special endeavors in their behalf. She should always treat them kindly; never scold, never worry, never fret. Do not lose patience though they make great blunders. Cover their dullness, as far as possible, with the mantle of love; never exhibit it to the ridiculing laugh of their brighter classmates. Have them understand that you are their best friend, who spares neither trouble nor labor for their advancement, and who would as far as possible, give them an equal opportunity for the race through life.

Wake up the ambition of such pupils by asking questions they can answer, and by pointing out the progress they have made; this will also strengthen their self-confidence. If possible, make them voluntarily try again. The dull pupils should be asked the easiest questions, and often, thus keeping them astir, and the bright pupils in reserve for the more difficult work. No question should be asked a dull pupil which, with good reason, the teacher doubts whether he can answer; for every question not answered will lessen his self-confidence and also his self-respect as to his standing in the class. Often the pupil's dullness vanishes entirely after his ambition has been aroused, and he is started aright.

If the dullness relates to one special branch, point out to the pupil the value of his study for practical life, and that his education will always have a defect if he does not master the difficulty now.

If, then, with all your care, you do not succeed as well as you wish, and you begin to think that your labor is thrown away, look to the after life of the pupil; I assure you he will appreciate your labor then, and be ever grateful for the kindness bestowed upon him.—Educational Record.

Schoolma'am and Mouse.

Miss Clara Evans and a mouse, the one a teacher in a Baltimore public school and the other a resident of the same building, collided while traversing their respective orbits, one day this week, and so startling were the noises which ensued that a panic among the children present was the result. They rushed for the door and downstairs in wildest terror, and a citizen who saw them emerge tumultuously into the street promptly turned in an alarm of fire from the nearest box. When the engines arrived the entire neighborhood was filled with excitement and mothers; but finally Miss Evans managed to explain the trouble, and in the end it was decided that nobody had been hurt or was likely to be. So rejoiced were the assembled taxpayers at this that not for several hours afterward did it occur to them that to call out the fire engines entails on the city an expense amounting to about $100.

Wanamaker Tells of His Conversion

Under the auspices of the Evangelical alliance ex-Postmaster General Wanamaker addressed a large audience in the Kensington Theater, at Frankfort avenue and Norris street, last evening. The call for the meeting was to those who are not regular church goers and a large majority of those present were men. Mr. Wanamaker told his hearers how, when he was an awkward country boy of 18 years, he once went to a religious meeting, sitting far back in the audience, and listened to the words of an old preacher, who said that now that he was old he felt how good it was to him that he had the religion of Christ to die by.

"I listened to the words of that good old man," said Mr. Wanamaker, "and I said to myself: 'I don't want to die now. I want to live and I want a religion to live by,' for I was young, you know, and all my thoughts were on this life. Then there followed a young minister, who told us that he had felt the blessings of the religion of Christ and that it was a good religion to live by and to do business by, and it would bring contentment and happiness to all who would embrace it. I then said to myself: 'Do you want that religion? Yes! When do you want it? Now!' I then and there made up my mind that I would have it right away. So I waited until the meeting was over and when the minister came down the aisle on his way out of the church, I stepped up to him and said: 'Mr. Chambers, I am going to accept the religion of Christ.' It was so easy for me to do it when I had finally worked it out in my own mind and heart, and it is just as easy for any of you to do it if you will, and I want you to try it for yourselves and see."

Mr. Wanamaker paid a high tribute to the late Samuel J. Randall and described how he had frequently visited him during his last illness and read to him out of the Bible, and how at one of his visits the statesman had said to him: "Mr. Wanamaker, I have found it there," pointing to his Bible, "and I am happy now."—Philadelphia Record.

The Thermogen.

A new invention, called by its inventor the thermogen, consists of a quilt containing a coil of wire bent in the fashion of a gridiron, enclosed in insulating and non-conducting material, and embedded in cotton wool or other soft substance with a silk or woolen covering. The resistance offered by the coil to the flow of an electric current through the wire produces heat in the same way that heat and eventually light are produced in the filament of the glow lamp. A uniform temperature of about 150 degrees Fahrenheit is thus maintained; but, in the event of the temperature rising beyond that point from increase of pressure in the electric mains, a fuse instantly melts and automatically shuts off the current. The quilt may be readily attached to ordinary incandescent lamp terminals.

Linenoid.

Pleasure boats and canoes are being manufactured with a new material, the base of which is linen, whence the boats have been designated "linenoid." The material is softened into a pulp, and this is shaped over a form and water-proofed. Being of one piece, there are, of course, no seams, and the material is stated to be of a consistency and flexibility resembling brass. Ash and oak are employed for keel, gunwale and seats, supports, floor boards, and other wood fittings, and brass is the only metal used for fastenings. The seats are supported on ash ribs, bearing on the keel and gunwale only, thus keeping any strain from being put upon the shell.

Building Made of Ashes.

A building has recently been erected by Herr Wagner, an architect, in Limburg, solely of materials formed of ashes, without any admixture of sand. It is claimed that hard natural stones of almost every variety have been successfully imitated with this very cheap material.

Widows Play a Progressive Game.

A woman contemplating a second marriage always determines that it shall be better than her first. That is the reason why some go on indulging in a progressive matrimonial game until death puts a stop to their ambition.

Every wife longs for the establishment of a religion that will forbid a widower marrying again.

The last echo of the campaign comes from Butler township, where it is claimed there is a young democrat so bashful he would not vote for Bryan for fear there would be so much silver in circulation and he would get so much of it that it would weigh down his pocket till his suspenders broke, and let his pants fall. Take a tow string, my friend, that will hold all the money you will be apt to any one time in the next four years.

Some Truth.

The following receipt is offered by a Western newspaper for "How to Kill a Newspaper." There are a few in this vicinity who have adopted the plan:

"Just let the subscription go. It's only a dollar or two—the publisher don't need it.

If he asks for it, get as mad as you can and tell him to stop the paper—you never read it anyhow. Then go and borrow your neighbor's.

When the reporter comes always be busy. Make him feel as if he were intruding. When the advertising and job man comes tell him you don't need to advertise—everybody knows you, that you will try to get along without any printed stationery—it is too expensive; you must economize.

Never drop in to see the editor unless you want a free complimentary notice or a lengthy obituary for a beloved relative. Never recommend the paper to anybody. When you do speak of it say "Yes, we have a little sheet, but it don't amount to much."

Keep it up a year or two and you will have a dead newspaper, a dead set of merchants and a dead town."

TREASURER FAIR

Is Short in His Accounts, and the Bondmen are called in to help Settle it.

Ever since Mr. Fair turned the treasurer's office over to Mr. Hines there have been unpleasant rumors in regard to difficulties in making a settlement between the outgoing and the incoming officers. When Mr. Hines took the office, the books showed that about $69,000 should be turned over by Mr. Fair, but as a matter of fact only about $57,000 were turned over. The difference is between $11,000 and $12,000, and the bondsmen and officers, at once took steps to see what caused this deficiency. Without any desire to prejudice, any one against any official, we feel it our duty to the people, and more especially to the taxpayers, to make as full and as correct a statement of the matter as is possible.

When Mr. Fair first took the office after the election in 1894 he made his son Perry, deputy and gave over to him a large part of the work and as far as could be, the responsibility. Mr. Fair himself probably felt that he did not understand the work and that his son did. As money came into the office, it was deposited at different bannks, as is the usual custom. Within a few months, Perry Fair found that his accounts did not agree with the accounts of the banks, that in one case at least he had the bank charged with several thousand dollars more than was shown by the bank's books. Instead of investigating this discrepancy at once, he allowed it to stand. June 30, '95 the regular annual settlement was made, and the figures as they came to the auditor, were correct, as far as now known. But whether the "money on hand" was in the treasury or not, could be known to no one but the treasurer on that day. Within a week or so, however, the Board of Commssioners met and of course had to examine the accounts and the funds. This they did, and we understand found everything correct. The question arises right here: What had been done with that discrepancy between the accounts of the treasurer and those of the bank? If that discrepancy still existed as is now claimed the treasurer's report made May 30, must have ignored it, and been made to show all the balance due from the bank to the treasury as shown by the treasurer's accounts. If this was done, the report made was wrong, and the deputy treasurer must have known it. If he is guilty of any wrong doing it would appear to be right along in this matter with the bank. If on May 30, he had not as much money on hand, as reported, it would still be possible to make a showing to the commissioners a week or so later. For in the meantime, new funds might have come in and been used to turn in to the Board, as money that was in the treasury before May 30. If this was done, here was another wrong. We do not say it was done, but it was possible and looks reasonable. Again, if this report of May 30, and the following settlement with the commissioners, were erroneous, the treasurer again did a wrong in letting it run on and not get it right. When it came time to make the report and settlement a year later, last May 30 and at the June session of the commissioners, it would be easy to settle by starting from the last settlement, providing no new error had been made. But the old error would still exist. And so it has run on till as above stated, the office changed hands. It is believed that the total amount of loss if it proves a loss as it now seems certain to be, may be reduced by various small sums to perhaps $8,000 or $9,000. For example, there is a balance claimed to be due Mr. Fair from L. S. Goodwin, who has been collecting delinquent taxes. This, when turned in will reduce the total that much. There are also, as is usually the case, a few tax receipts in the hands of the treasurer, Mr. Fair, which in most instances are good for the money. This last item is caused by people coming to the treasurer at the close of taxpaying time and asking him to make out a receipt for their taxes and wait on them a short time. This is especially the case in a campaign year and if the treasurer is a candidate for re-election there will be more calls of this kind, some of them by men who do not intend to pay. But they take the officer at a time when he is weak and if he is not pretty level headed will make it an expensive campaign for him. Just how much of this kind of work was run in on Mr. Fair we do not know but have no doubt but there was some of it. And though he may hold the receipts, the books show "paid" and he has to take his chances of getting the money.

Mr. Fair himself, when he returned to his farm, appears to have supposed everything was all right. Saturday when he was informed of the trouble it was a great blow to him. He was up here and several of the bondsmen met him. Perry Fair was also called in, and some of the facts above stated were obtained from him. To-day other bondsmen came in. Mr. Boland and Perry Fair went up to Waterloo to see how matters stand in the Goodwin books. There are 26 bondsmen in all, and if the loss is not reduced it will mean about $400 apiece for them. There seems to be no disposition on their part to fight the case, but will come up and stand whatever is necessary. If Mr. Fair turns in his property, it will reduce the amount that much, but of course will ruin him. It is an unfortunate case, for no one believes the ex-treasurer is dishonest. The worst that can be said of him is that he was not competent to run the business.

A case is being prepared for the coming court by County Attorney J. H. Rose who will be assisted by Judge McClellan, against the Treasurer and his bondsmen, and that will bring out the facts more fully.

Explanatory.

In speaking Monday, of the Fair matter, we alluded to the treasurer's "accounts with the banks." We have since learned it was the Garrett bank only all the accounts with other banks being found correct. We add this statement in justice to all parties, as when we wrote the first article we were not fully informed.

Not Guilty.

A son of John B. Bryant of Troy, was was recently arrested on a charge of disturbing a meeting, but on being brought before Squire Sise at Butler. it was found there was no case against him. The boy has a good reputation where he is known, as far as we can learn, and the worst that could be shown, was that he and some other boys had whispered. We do not think it proper to whisper even, in church, but are sorry to say that very respectable people often do so. This should be a warning to them to be on their guard and respect the house of worship fully. Mr. Bryant is a man who believes in obeying the laws of the land and of propriety, and was ready to stand a fine if his son was guilty. We are glad he was exonerated.

Obituary.

Russell G. McIntosh, infant son of Gib and Attie McIntosh, died Dec. 6th 1896, aged 8 months and 19 days.

He was the second son of the bereaved parents and all through the dreadful lingering days, they hung over the couch of their little darling. with breathless anxiety, alternating between hope and fear, until after four weeks of great suffering the little spark of life was extinguished on this earth.

The parents desire the writer to express their thanks to the friends and neighbors for their ceaseless and untiring efforts to aid and comfort them. Cottage services were held at their home Tuesday afternoon and the remains were interred in the Waterloo cemetery.

DeKALB MAN

Another DeKalb man has been put on an honorable mission by Gov. Matthews. We refer to the recent appointment of John F. Shuman, of Waterloo, who has been made a delegate to the national convention that meets at Tampa, Florida in January for the purpose of discussing the South Atlantic and Gulf harbors and Coast, Defenses as well as the methods of extending our maritime trade. He starts south next Monday, and we hope to lay before our readers, now and then, a letter from him on some of these subjects.

Everything Expected

Hon. J. B. Stoll, editor of the South Bend (Ind.) Times, says: "Subscribers of country newspapers often allow their subscriptions to become delinquent through carelessness, and yet feel insulted if their paper is stopped or a statement of their delinquency is sent to them. They do not expect any courtesy from metropolitan papers, but the country papers are expected to come on whether they are paid for or not. This is an unjust exaction. Because he is editor of a country newspaper is no reason why he should carry you year after year. The income from subscriptions to a newspaper is an important item. Like snowflakes they are individually small, but when aggregated they pile up wonderfully. Shey should be coming in every day in the year. They must come if the publisher pays his bills which fall due every month in the year." And a great deal of money is lost in this way, when it might be secured just as well as not by sending the delinquent accounts to some reputable collection agency. Subscribers rarely discontinue when they settle their indebtedness in this way, and if they do, all the better.

JOSEPH LINK.

A Wife Equal to a Gold Mine!

Will some of your readers give me a good receipt for making a cold starch? I am selling self-heating flat irons and iron a little at every house and have to use some starch every place and want to know how to make a good cold starch. My husband was in debt and I being anxious to help him thought I would sell self-heating flat irons and I am doing splendidly. A cent's worth of fuel will even heat. You can iron in half the time and no danger of scorching the clothes as with the old iron, and you can get the most beautiful gloss. I sell at nearly every house, as the iron saves so much fuel, everybody wants one. I make $1.50 on each iron and have not sold less than ten any day I worked. My brother is doing well and I think anyone can make lots of money anywhere selling irons. J. F. CASEY & Co., St. Louis, Mo., will start anyone in the business, as they did me; if you will address them. MRS. A RUSSELL.

Horrible! Horrible!

Innocent children by the thousand are constantly dying of diarrhœa whose life might be saved. How quickly the demon works! Flesh speedily wastes away as though subjected to fire. You try change of water, and change of food and change of air. The handiest and quickest and safest thing you can do is to procure at once a bottle of Dr. Hand's Diarrhœa Mixture, at any drug store, for 25c. It's wonderful how quickly it brings good results. Fischler & Son.

My Baby.

CANTON, O., 2-26-96—Hand Medicine Co.—"My baby had been having wind colic since her birth and she was two months old when I procured a bottle of Dr. Hand's Colic Cure. In less than two weeks' time she was cured of having colic and has never had it since. We had tried several other medicines, but they did no good. I can cheerfully recommend your colic cure to be the best. Mrs. F. H. Rock," Sold by Fischler & Son, 25c.
